CHAPTER I

THE UNIVERSAL BELIEF IN THEM

IT is one of the most beautiful characteristics of Theosophy that it gives back to people in a more rational form everything which was really useful and helpful to them in the religions which they have outgrown. Many who have broken through the chrysalis of blind faith, and mounted on the wings of reason and intuition to the freer, nobler mental life of more exalted levels, nevertheless feel that in the process of this glorious gain a something has been lost—that in giving up the beliefs of their childhood they have also cast aside much of the beauty and the poetry of life.

If, however, their lives in the past have been sufficiently good to earn for them the opportunity of coming under the benign influence of Theosophy, they very soon discover that even in this particular there has been no loss at all, but an exceeding great gain—that the glory and the beauty and the poetry are there in fuller measure than they had ever hoped before, and no longer as a mere pleasant dream from which the cold light of common sense may at any time rudely awaken them, but as truths of nature which will bear investigation—which become only brighter, fuller and more perfect as they are more accurately understood.

A marked instance of this beneficent action of Theosophy is the way in which the invisible world (which, before the great wave of materialism engulfed us, used to be regarded as the source of all living help) has been restored by it to modern life. All the charming folk-lore of the elf, the brownie and the gnome, of the spirits of air and water, of the forest, the mountain and the mine, is shown by it to be no mere meaningless superstition, but to have a basis of actual and scientific fact behind it. Its answer to the great fundamental question: "If a man die, shall he live again?" is equally definite and scientific, and its teaching on the nature and conditions of the life after death throws a flood of light upon much that, for the Western world at least, was previously wrapped in impenetrable darkness.

It cannot be too often repeated that in this teaching as to the immortality of the soul and the life after death, Theosophy stands in a position totally different from that of ordinary religion. It does not put forward these great truths merely on the authority of some sacred book of long ago; in speaking of these subjects it is not dealing with pious opinions, or metaphysical speculations, but with solid, definite facts, as real and as close to us as the air we breathe or the houses in which we live—facts of which many among us have constant experience—facts among which lies the daily work of some of our students, as will presently be seen. Moi qui vous parle—I who now write these words—am telling you of things which have been familiar to me for more than forty years, which are now much more real and important to me than the matters of the physical plane.

I take it that most of my readers are already acquainted with the general Theosophical conception of the world beyond the grave—that it is not far away or intrinsically different from this world, but on the contrary that it is really a mere continuation of it, a life without the drawback of a physical body—a life which for those who are in any way intellectual or artistic is quite infinitely superior to this, although it may sometimes seem monotonous to those who have neither spiritual, intellectual nor artistic development.

In that life, as in this, there are many people who need assistance, and we should be ready to try to give it in any way that we can, for there is a vast amount to be done, and that along many different lines. The idea of helping in that world is not confined to Theosophists, but I do not think that, until the Theosophical Society propounded it, it was ever taken up in a scientific, definite and organized way. Still, by no means all the helpers are members of our Society. The dead have always aided the dead, and they have often tried to comfort the living, but until the Theosophical line of study opened before us, I think that comparatively few living people worked directly in the astral world. A great number of living people have always worked indirectly, as for example by prayers for the dead; but such effort is generally somewhat vague, because those who make it do not usually know much of the real state of affairs on the other side of the grave. But in the great Roman Catholic Church men have always prayed for those who have departed this life in God's faith and fear, and that prayer is by no means an empty form.

Prayer is perhaps not necessary in the way which those who pray often think; it is not needful that we should tell our God what we should like Him to do; but that is not to say that prayer produces no result. It is a great outpouring of force on higher planes—a great mental and emotional effort; and in a world which is governed by law there can be no effort made which does not produce some kind of result, because action and reaction are inextricably woven together, and any effort, whether it be physical, emotional or mental, must produce something in the nature of an effect or reaction; and unquestionably prayers for the dead have had a very great effect upon the dead. They have liberated a great deal of spiritual force; they have benefited and helped in evolution those for whom they were intended, so that even without knowing of the possibility of direct work on higher planes, the living have always influenced those who have passed away.

It might occur to some inquirer to ask why, since before Theosophy was divulged the Great White Brotherhood of the Adepts existed, did not They or Their pupils give this help? We must understand that the Adepts are engaged in very much higher work of far more importance than this. Our ideas of relative importance are so utterly out of proportion. We think that everything that concerns us personally must be of first importance, and do not realize that the forces which are working out the evolution of the globe deal with people not individually, not even by scores and hundreds, but by thousands and millions. It could not be that the Adepts should devote their time to work of this kind. Their pupils might, but until Theosophy promulgated these ideas in the West most of the pupils of the Masters were Indian; and any of you who know anything of the Hindu religion will understand that this idea of helping individual dead people would not be likely to occur to its students.

Their idea of the after-death state would be rather to let themselves be absorbed in some representation of the Deity, and so obtain great advancement. No doubt, after the advancement was attained they might be of use to humanity, but hardly at the present intermediate stage. Also there was little need of help among the dead of their own people, because the Hindu religion teaches its followers something of the states after death, so that the Indian when he dies would be by no means alarmed or disturbed. The thought that the dead might need help beyond the ordinary Shraddha ceremony would be somewhat foreign to the Indian mind; so the fact remains that very little organized work was done.

The feeling of the Theosophists who in the beginning took up this work was, first of all, that they should not waste the hours of sleep, and secondly, that here was great scope for an activity in which every person who knew even a little about the conditions of that world could be of use. So they threw themselves into it and did what they could.

There have been other religions which taught in minute detail the conditions of the life after death. The Egyptian religion did so, but its methods were Atlantean; its votaries had no idea of generalization. They knew a vast multiplicity of cases, but never seemed to infer general rules from them. In the Book of the Dead we find an enormous amount of detail, and in each case the method of dealing with it is carefully chronicled; but they never seem to have arrived at the fact that all these methods were manifestations of the human will, and that a strong will would carry a man through without the detailed knowledge, so that all their charms and curious recitations were unnecessary.

Until Theosophy took up the matter we never had in the West any statement about the world after death which was in harmony with the line of modern science. Spiritualism did something for us in the way of collecting information, but its methods were sporadic. It did not tell us much about that other world as a whole. I think we may claim that Theosophy has done that for us; it has applied the modern scientific spirit to this problem of the unseen world, and has tabulated its observations and built up a coherent system. Of course we have no special prerogative in all this; all the information which we have about the astral world might be obtained by any intelligent denizen of that world. So we frequently find particulars which we are in the habit of calling Theosophical coming through other channels; and that would be so still more often if it were not for the fact that most dead people are not trained scientific observers; they describe just what they see close round them, and do not try to see their world as a whole.

When we first began to try to do work during sleep, we soon found that there were many lines along which help was wanted, both by the living and the dead. I am using these words "living" and "dead" in the ordinary acceptation, and I suppose I ought not to do so without entering a protest. Those dead people, as they are never tired of telling us, are much more alive than we. They speak of us as dead, because we are buried in these tombs of flesh and shut out from higher influences. They never regret their condition, but rather pity us in ours. We will think of them later; let us first see what we can do to help living people.

Remember that every night when you fall asleep you abandon your body. You are then living as freely in the astral world as any dead man, though you retain the power to return to your physical vehicle in the morning. But for the time you meet the more permanent astral resident upon equal terms, and can converse with him face to face precisely as you meet your physical friends every day down here.

On that plane as on this, you can comfort the sufferers; even those who still live in this denser world can be aided by your kindly feeling. As a rule you cannot show yourself to any person who is awake in his physical body; to do that materialization is needed—that is to say, you must draw round your astral body a veil of physical matter, and that is an art which has to be acquired, and is not easily won. You can pour love and sympathy upon him at any time; but to show yourself to him or to speak to him, it is better to wait till he is asleep. Even from your astral body you can send out soothing and calming currents which will quieten overstrained physical nerves, and enable a person to sleep who could not otherwise do so. Also you can often relieve mental anguish by putting cheerful thoughts into a man's mind, and showing him without words that his case, after all, might be very much worse than it is.

You can often do something towards calming people who are in a state of worry and excitement. There are thousands of them who never know what it is to be free from worry, and very often it is about some trifling affair which really does not matter in the least. Such men are mentally ill—in a condition of very serious illness as regards their higher vehicles. Then there are the people who are always doubting everything; that is another form of mental disease, and sometimes you can do much to relieve it by giving them the plain common sense of Theosophy. They are often materialists, and claim that their doctrine is common sense; but you can explain that a theory which declines to take into account non-physical facts is hardly worthy of that name, and on the astral plane those facts are far more easily demonstrated than on this.

Again, we can try to help those whom we love by flooding them with qualities which we see to be lacking in them. If we have a friend who is painfully shy and nervous, we can often send him thoughts of courage, strength and confidence; if we find him apt to be harsh and intolerant in his judgments, we can enfold him in clouds of love and gentleness. But such work must be done with the very greatest care—always by quiet suggestion, and never for a moment by domination. It is not difficult from that higher world to impress a strong thought upon a person; it would be quite possible to dominate an average man, and practically coerce him by thought to adopt a certain line of action; but we should consider that entirely inadmissible.

Among the beautiful conceptions which Theosophy has restored to us stands pre-eminent that of the great helpful agencies of nature. The belief in these has been world-wide from the earliest dawn of history, and is universal even now outside the narrow domains of protestantism, which has emptied and darkened the world for its votaries by its attempt to do away with the natural and perfectly true idea of intermediate agents, and reduce everything to the two factors of man and Deity—a device whereby the conception of Deity has been infinitely degraded, and man has remained unhelped.

A moment's thought will show that the ordinary view of Providence—the conception of an erratic interference by the Central Power of the universe with the result of His own decrees—would imply the introduction of partiality into the scheme, and therefore of the whole train of evils which must necessarily follow upon its heels. The Theosophical teaching, that a man can be thus specially helped only when his past actions have been such as to deserve this assistance, and that even then the help will be given through those who are comparatively near his own level, is free from this serious objection; and it furthermore brings back to us the older and far grander conception of an unbroken ladder of living beings extending down from the Logos Himself to the very dust beneath our feet.

In the East the existence of the invisible helpers has always been recognized, though the names given and the characteristics attributed to them naturally vary in different countries; and even here in Europe we have had the old Greek stories of the constant interference of the gods in human affairs, and the Roman legend that Castor and Pollux led the legions of the infant republic in the battle of Lake Regillus. Nor did such a conception die out when the classical period ended, for these stories have their legitimate successors in mediaeval tales of saints who appeared at critical moments and turned the fortune of war in favour of the Christian hosts, or of guardian Angels who sometimes stepped in and saved a pious traveller from what would otherwise have been certain destruction.

CHAPTER II

SOME MODERN INSTANCES

EVEN in this incredulous age, and amidst the full whirl of our twentieth-century civilization, in spite of the dogmatism of our science and the deadly dulness of our protestantism, instances of intervention inexplicable from the materialistic standpoint may still be found by anyone who will take the trouble to look for them; and in order to demonstrate this to the reader I will briefly epitomize a few of the examples given in one or other of the recent collections of such stories, adding thereto one or two that have come within my own notice.

One very remarkable feature of these more recent examples is that the intervention seems so often to have been directed towards the helping or saving of children.

An interesting case which occurred in London only a few years ago was connected with the preservation of a child's life in the midst of a terrible fire, which broke out in a street near Holborn, and entirely destroyed two of the houses there. The flames had obtained such hold before they were discovered that the firemen were unable to save the houses, but they succeeded in rescuing all the inmates except two—an old woman who was suffocated by the smoke before they could reach her, and a child about five years old, whose presence in the house had been forgotten in the hurry and excitement of the moment.

The mother of the child, it seems, was a friend or relative of the landlady of the house, and had left the little creature in her charge for the night, because she was herself obliged to go down to Colchester on business. It was not until every one else had been rescued, and the whole house was wrapped in flame, that the landlady remembered with a terrible pang the trust that had been confided to her. It seemed hopeless then to attempt to reach the garret where the child had been put to bed, but one of the firemen heroically resolved to make the desperate effort, and, after receiving minute directions as to the exact situation of the room, plunged in among the smoke and flame.

He found the child, and brought him forth entirely unharmed; but when he rejoined his comrades he had a very singular story to tell. He declared that when he reached the room he found it in flames, and most of the floor already fallen; but the fire had curved round the room towards the window in an unnatural and unaccountable manner, the like of which in all his experience he had never seen before, so that the corner in which the child lay was wholly untouched, although the very rafters of the fragment of floor on which his little crib stood were half burnt away. The child was naturally very much terrified, but the fireman distinctly and repeatedly declared that as at great risk he made his way towards him he saw a form like an Angel—here his exact words are given—a something “all gloriously white and silvery, bending over the bed and smoothing down the counterpane.” He could not possibly have made any mistake about it, he said, for it was visible in a glare of light for some moments, and in fact, disappeared only when he was within a few feet of it.

Another curious feature of this story is that the child's mother found herself unable to sleep that night down at Colchester, but was constantly harassed by a strong feeling that something was wrong with her child, insomuch that at last she was compelled to rise and spend some time in earnest prayer that the little one might be protected from the danger which she instinctively felt to be hanging over him. The intervention was thus evidently what a Christian would call an answer to prayer: a Theosophist putting the same idea in more scientific phraseology, would say that her intense outpouring of love constituted a force which one of our invisible helpers was able to use for the rescue of her child from a terrible death.

A remarkable case in which children were abnormally protected occurred on the banks of the Thames near Maidenhead a few years earlier than our last example. This time the danger from which they were saved arose not from fire but from water. Three little ones, who lived, if I recollect rightly, in or near the village of Shottesbrook, were taken out for a walk along the towing-path by their nurse. They rushed suddenly round a corner upon a horse which was drawing a barge, and in the confusion two of them found themselves on the wrong side of the tow-rope and were thrown into the water.

The boatman, who saw the accident, sprang forward to try to save them, and he noticed that they were floating high in the water "in quite an unnatural way, like," as he said, and moving quietly towards the bank. This was all that he and the nurse saw, but the children each declared that "a beautiful person, all white and shining," stood beside them in the water, held them up and guided them to the shore. Nor was their story without corroboration, for the bargeman's little daughter, who ran up from the cabin when she heard the screams of the nurse, also affirmed that she saw a lovely lady in the water dragging the two children to the bank.

Without fuller particulars than the story gives us, it is impossible to say with certainty from what class of helpers this "Angel" was drawn; but the probabilities are in favour of its having been a developed human being functioning in the astral body, as will be seen when later on we deal with this subject from the other side, as it were—from the point of view of the helpers rather than the helped.

A case in which the agency is somewhat more definitely distinguishable is related by the well-known clergyman, Dr. John Mason Neale. He states that a man who had recently lost his wife was on a visit with his little children at the country house of a friend. It was an old, rambling mansion, and in the lower part of it there were long, dark passages, in which the children played about with great delight. But presently they came upstairs very gravely, and two of them related that as they were running down one of these passages they were met by their mother, who told them to go back again, and then disappeared. Investigation revealed the fact that if the children had run but a few steps farther they would have fallen down a deep uncovered well which yawned full in their path, so that the apparition of their mother had saved them from almost certain death.

In this instance there seems no reason to doubt that the mother herself was still keeping a loving watch over her children from the astral plane, and that (as has happened in some other cases) her intense desire to warn them of the danger into which they were so heedlessly rushing gave her the power to make herself visible and audible to them for the moment—or perhaps merely to impress their minds with the idea that they saw and heard her. It is possible, of course, that the helper may have been someone else, who took the familiar form of the mother in order not to alarm the children; but the simplest hypothesis is to attribute the intervention to the action of the ever-wakeful mother-love itself, undimmed by the passage through the gates of death.

This mother-love, being one of the holiest and most unselfish of human feelings, is also one of the most persistent on higher planes. Not only does the mother who finds herself upon the lower levels of the astral plane, and consequently still within touch of the earth, maintain her interest in and her care for her children as long as she is able to see them; even after her entry into the heaven-world these little ones are still the most prominent objects in her thought, and the wealth of love that she lavishes upon the images which she there makes of them is a great outpouring of spiritual force which flows down upon her offspring who are still struggling in this lower world, and surrounds them with living centres of beneficent energy which may not inaptly be described as veritable guardian Angels.

This was well illustrated by a case which some time ago came under the notice of our investigators. It was that of a mother who had died perhaps twenty years before, leaving behind her two boys to whom she was deeply attached. Naturally they were the most prominent figures in her heaven-life, and quite naturally, too, she thought of them as she had left them, as boys of fifteen or sixteen years of age. The love which she thus ceaselessly poured out upon these images in the heaven-world was really acting as a beneficent force showered down upon the grown-up men in this physical world, but it did not affect them both to the same extent—not that her love was stronger for one than for the other, but because there was a great difference between the images themselves.

Not a difference, be it understood, that the mother could see; to her both appeared equally with her, and equally all that she could possibly desire: yet to the eyes of the investigators it was very evident that one of these images was a mere thought-form of the mother's, without anything that could be called a reality at the back of it, while the other was distinctly much more than a mere image, for it was instinct with living force. On tracing this interesting phenomenon to its source, it was found that in the first case the son had grown up into an ordinary man of business—not specially evil in any way, but by no means spiritually-minded—while the second had become a man of high unselfish aspiration, and of considerable refinement and culture. His life had been such as to develop a much greater amount of consciousness in the ego than his brother's, and consequently his higher self was able to energize the image of himself as a boy which his mother had formed in her heaven-life—to put something of himself into it, as it were.

That some children, at least, can see Angels is the belief of the Bishop of London.

Preaching at St. Paul's, Haringay, his lordship stated that God and the Angels were always near us, and he asked the congregation not to regard a child's remark that he or she had seen such beings as mere fancy. He told them that he was once confirming in Westminster Abbey, and among the congregation was a child of thirteen, who had come to see her brother confirmed.

Nothing at all on the matter had been put into her mind, but at the service she said to her mother:

"Do you see them, mother?"

"See what?" asked the mother, and the child replied:

"Angels on each side of the Bishop."

It was said that the pure in heart shall see God, and was it not therefore possible that a child perfectly pure could see things which adults could not see?

The Bishop also told a story of five girls whose father, feeling ill, went to lie down. The youngest girl went up to bed, but came from her room calling:

"Come out! there are two Angels walking up the staircase!"

No one else could see anything. Later the child again called:

"Come out! the Angels are walking down the staircase now, and father is walking between them."

All five girls this time saw the same thing, and going to their father's room they found his dead body.

Not long ago the little daughter of another of our English Bishops was out walking with her mother in the town where they lived, and in running heedlessly across a street the child was knocked down by the horses of a carriage which came quickly upon her round a corner. Seeing her among the horses' feet, the mother rushed forward, expecting to find her very badly injured, but she sprang up quite merrily, saying: "O mamma, I am not at all hurt, for something all in white kept the horses from treading upon me, and told me not to be afraid."

A case which occurred in Buckinghamshire, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Burnham Beeches, is remarkable on account of the length of time through which the physical manifestation of the succouring agency seems to have maintained itself. It will have been seen that in the instances hitherto given the intervention was a matter of but a few moments, whereas in this a phenomenon was produced which appears to have persisted for more than half an hour.

Two of the little children of a small farmer were left to amuse themselves while their parents and their entire household were engaged in the work of harvesting. The little ones started for a walk in the woods, wandered far from home, and then managed to lose their way. When the weary parents returned at dusk it was discovered that the children were missing, and after enquiring at some of the neighbours' houses the father sent servants and labourers in various directions to seek for them.

Their efforts were, however, unsuccessful, and their shouts unanswered; and they had reassembled at the farm in a somewhat despondent frame of mind, when they all saw a curious light some distance away moving slowly across some fields towards the road. It was described as a large globular mass of rich golden glow, quite unlike ordinary lamp-light; and as it drew nearer it was seen that the two missing children were walking steadily along in the midst of it. The father and some others immediately set off running towards it; the appearance persisted until they were close to it, but just as they grasped the children it vanished, leaving them in the darkness.

The children's story was that after night came on they had wandered about crying in the woods for some time, and had at last lain down under a tree to sleep. They had been roused, they said, by a beautiful lady with a lamp, who took them by the hand and led them home; when they questioned her she smiled at them, but never spoke a word. To this strange tale they both steadily adhered, nor was it possible in any way to shake their faith in what they had seen. It is noteworthy, however, that though all present saw the light, and noticed that it lit up the trees and hedges which came within its sphere precisely as an ordinary light would, yet the form of the lady was visible to none but the children.

CHAPTER III

A PERSONAL EXPERIENCE

ALL the above stories are comparatively well known, and may be found in some of the books which contain collections of such accounts—most of them in Dr. Lee's More Glimpses of the World Unseen; but the two instances which I am now about to give have never been in print before, and both occurred within the last few years—one to myself, and the other to our great President, the accuracy of whose observation is beyond all shadow of doubt.

My own story is simple enough, though not unimportant to me, since the interposition undoubtedly saved my life. I was walking one exceedingly wet and stormy night down a quiet back street near Westbourne Grove, struggling with scant success to hold up an umbrella against the savage gusts of wind that threatened every moment to tear it from my grasp, and trying as I laboured along, to think out the details of some work upon which I was just then engaged.

With starting suddenness a voice which I know well—the voice of an Indian teacher—cried in my ear “Spring back!” and in mechanical obedience I started violently backwards almost before I had time to think. As I did so my umbrella, which had swung forward with the sudden movement, was struck from my hand, and a huge metal chimney-pot crashed upon the pavement less than a yard in front of my face. The great weight of this article, and the tremendous force with which it fell, make it absolutely certain that but for the warning voice I should have been killed on the spot; yet the street was empty, and the voice was that of one whom I knew to be seven thousand miles away from me, as far as the physical body was concerned.

Nor was this the only occasion upon which I received assistance of this supernormal kind, for in early life, long before the foundation of the Theosophical Society, the apparition of a dear one who had recently died prevented me from committing what I now see would have been a serious crime, although by the light of such knowledge as I then had it appeared not only a justifiable but even a laudable act of retaliation. Again, at a later date, though still before the foundation of this Society, a warning conveyed to me from a higher plane amid most impressive surroundings enabled me to prevent another man from entering upon a course which I now know would have ended disastrously, though I had no reason to suppose so at the time. So it will be seen that I have a certain amount of personal experience to strengthen my belief in the doctrine of invisible helpers, even apart from my knowledge of the help that is constantly being given at the present time.

The other case is much more striking. When this book was first published, more than thirty years ago, our beloved President, though she gave me permission to publish several stories of her work and her adventures upon higher planes, did not wish her name mentioned in connection with them; but at this distance of time there seems no longer any reason why her many thousands of devoted followers should be deprived of the immense pleasure which they will derive from the identification of the heroine of such wonderful and beautiful experiences with a Teacher whom they so deeply love and revere. So I think she will pardon me if I reveal a secret of thirty years' standing!

Our great Leader, then, once found herself in serious physical peril. Owing to circumstances which need not be detailed here, she was in the very centre of a dangerous street fracas, and seeing several men struck down and evidently badly hurt close to her, was in momentary expectation of a similar fate, since escape from the crush seemed quite impossible.

Suddenly she experienced a curious sensation of being whirled out of the crowd and found herself standing quite uninjured and entirely alone in a small by-street parallel with that in which the disturbance had taken place. She still heard the noise of the struggle, and while she stood wondering what on earth had happened to her, two or three men who had escaped from the crowd came running round the corner of the street, and on seeing her expressed great astonishment and pleasure, saying that when the brave lady so suddenly disappeared from the midst of the fight they had felt certain that she had been struck down.

At the time no sort of explanation was forthcoming, and she returned home in a very mystified condition; but when at a later period she mentioned this strange occurrence to Madame Blavatsky she was informed that, her karma being such as to enable her to be saved from her exceedingly dangerous position, one of the Masters had specially sent someone to protect her, in view of the fact that her life was needed for the work.

Nevertheless the case remains very extraordinary, both with regard to the great amount of power exercised and the unusually public nature of its manifestation. It is not difficult to imagine the modus operandi; she must have been lifted bodily over the intervening block of houses, and simply set down in the next street; but since her physical body was not visible floating in the air, it is also evident that a veil of some sort (probably of etheric matter) must have been thrown round her while in transit.

If it be objected that whatever can hide physical matter must itself be physical, and therefore visible, it may be replied that by a process familiar to all occult students it is possible to bend rays of light (which, under all conditions at present known to science, travel only in straight lines unless refracted) so that after passing round an object they may resume exactly their former course; and it will at once be seen that if this were done such an object would to all physical eyes be absolutely invisible until the rays were allowed to resume their normal course. I am fully aware that this one statement alone is sufficient to brand my remarks as nonsense in the eyes of the scientist of the present day, but I cannot help that; I am merely stating a possibility in nature which the science of the future will no doubt one day discover, and for those who are not students of occultism the remark must wait until then for its justification.

The process, as I say, is comprehensible enough to anyone who understands a little about the more occult forces of nature; but the phenomenon still remains exceedingly dramatic.

Another recent instance of interposition, less striking, perhaps, but entirely successful, has been reported to me since the publication of the first edition of this book. A lady, being obliged to undertake a long railway journey alone, had taken the precaution to secure an empty compartment; but just as the train was leaving the station, a man of forbidding and villainous appearance sprang in and seated himself at the other end of the carriage. The lady was much alarmed, thus to be left alone with so doubtful-looking a character, but it was too late to call for help, so she sat still and commended herself earnestly to the care of her patron saint.

Soon her fears were redoubled, for the man arose and turned toward her with an evil grin, but he had hardly taken one step when he started back with a look of the most intense astonishment and terror. Following the direction of his glance, she was startled to see a gentleman seated directly opposite to her, gazing quietly but firmly at the baffled robber—a gentleman who certainly could not have entered the carriage by any ordinary means. Too much awed to speak, she watched him as though fascinated for a full half-hour; he uttered no word, and did not even look at her, but kept his eyes steadily upon the villain,¹ who cowered trembling in the furthest corner of the compartment.

The moment that the train reached the next station, and even before it came to a standstill, the would-be thief tore open the door and sprang hurriedly out. The lady, deeply thankful to be rid of him, turned to express her gratitude to the gentleman, but found only an empty seat, though it would have been impossible for any physical body to have left the carriage in the time.

The materialization was in this case maintained for a longer period than usual, but on the other hand it expended no force in action of any kind—nor indeed was it necessary that it should do so, as its mere appearance was sufficient to effect its purpose.

But these stories, all referring as they do to what would commonly be called angelic intervention, illustrate only one small part of the activities of our invisible helpers. Before, however, we can profitably consider the other departments of their work it will be well that we should have clearly in our minds the various classes of entities to which it is possible that these helpers may belong. Let that, then, be the portion of our subject to be next treated.

CHAPTER IV

THE HELPERS

HELP, then, may be given by several of the many classes of inhabitants of the astral plane. It may come from devas, from nature-spirits, or from those whom we call the dead, as well as from those who function consciously upon the astral plane during life—chiefly the Adepts and their pupils. But if we examine the matter a little more closely we shall see that though all the classes mentioned may, and sometimes do, take a part in this work, yet their shares in it are so unequal that it is practically left almost entirely to one class.

The very fact that so much of this work of helping has to be done either upon or from the astral plane goes far in itself towards explaining this. To anyone who has even a faint idea of what the powers at the command of an Adept really are, it will be at once obvious that for him to work upon the astral plane would be a far greater waste of energy than for our leading physicians or scientists to spend their time in breaking stones upon the road.

The work of the Adept lies in loftier regions—chiefly upon the three higher levels of the mental plane, where he may direct his energies to the influencing of the ego or true individuality of man, and not the mere personality which is all that can be reached in the astral or physical world. The strength which he puts forth in that more exalted realm produces results greater, more far-reaching and more lasting than any which can be attained by the expenditure of even ten times the force down here; and the work up there is such as he alone can fully accomplish, while that on lower planes may be at any rate to some extent achieved by those whose feet are yet upon the earlier steps of the great stairway which will one day lead them to the position where he stands.

The same remarks apply also in the case of the devas or Angels. Belonging, as they do, to a higher kingdom of nature than ours, their work seems for the most part entirely unconnected with humanity; and even those of their orders—and there are some such—which do sometimes respond to our higher yearnings or appeals, do so on the mental plane rather than on the physical or astral, and more frequently in the periods between our incarnations than during our earthly lives.

It may be remembered that some instances of such help were observed in the course of investigations.

into the subdivisions of the mental plane which were undertaken when the Theosophical manual on the subject was in preparation. In one case an Angel was found teaching the most wonderful celestial music to a chorister; and in another one of a different class was giving instruction and guidance to an astronomer who was seeking to comprehend the form and structure of the universe.

These two were but examples of many instances in which the great angelic kingdom was found to be helping onward the evolution and responding to the higher aspirations of man after death; and there are methods by which, even during earth-life, these great ones may be approached, and an infinity of knowledge acquired from them, though even then such intercourse is gained rather by rising to their plane than by invoking them to descend to ours.

In the ordinary events of our physical life the Angel very rarely interferes—indeed, he is so fully occupied with the far grander work of his own plane that he is probably scarcely conscious of this; and though it may occasionally happen that he becomes aware of some human sorrow or difficulty which excites his pity and moves him to endeavour to help in some way, his wider vision undoubtedly recognizes that at the present stage of evolution such interpositions would, in the vast majority of cases, be productive of infinitely more harm than good.

There was indubitably a period in the past—in the infancy of the human race—when it was much more largely assisted from outside than is at present the case. At the time when all its Buddhas and Manus, and even its more ordinary leaders and teachers, were drawn either from the ranks of the angelic evolution or from the perfected humanity of a more advanced planet, any such assistance as we are considering in this treatise must also have been given by these exalted beings. But as man progresses he becomes himself qualified to act as a helper, first on the physical plane and then on higher levels; and we have now reached a stage at which humanity ought to be able to provide, and to some slight extent does provide, invisible helpers for itself, thus setting free for still more useful and elevated work those beings who are capable of it.

At the present time, however, there is another factor to be taken into account. In the process of its evolution the world, which is swayed and helped in turn by each of the Seven great Rays, is just entering upon a period when the special influence of the Seventh of those Rays is dominant; and one of the most marked characteristics of that Ray is that it promotes co-operation between the human and the angelic kingdoms of nature. The relations between these two kingdoms are therefore likely to become closer and more prominent in the near future; and their nearer approach may probably manifest itself in the multiplication of cases of individual assistance and intercourse, as well as in collaboration in magnificent ceremonial of various kinds.¹

Still, that does not alter the obvious fact that such assistance as that to which we are here referring may most fitly be given by men and women at a particular stage of their evolution; not by the Adepts, since they are capable of doing far grander and more widely useful work, and not by the ordinary person of no special spiritual development, for he would be unable to be of any use. Just as these considerations would lead us to expect, we find that this work of helping on the astral and lower mental planes is chiefly in the hands of the pupils of the Masters—men who, though yet far from the attainment of Adeptship, have evolved themselves to the extent of being able to function consciously upon the planes in question.

Some of these have taken the further step of completing the links between the physical consciousness and that of the higher levels, and they therefore have the undoubted advantage of recollecting in waking life what they have done and what they have learnt in those other worlds; but there are many others who, though as yet unable to carry their consciousness through unbroken, are nevertheless by no means wasting the hours when they think they are asleep, but spending them in noble and unselfish labour for their fellow-men.

What this labour is we shall proceed to consider, but before we enter upon that part of the subject we will first refer to an objection which is frequently brought forward with regard to such work, and we will also dispose of the comparatively rare cases in which the agents are either nature-spirits or men who have cast off the physical body.

People whose grasp of Theosophical ideas is as yet imperfect are often in doubt as to whether it is allowable for them to try to help someone whom they find in sorrow or difficulty, lest they should interfere with the fate which has been decreed for him by the absolute justice of the eternal law of karma. "The man is in his present position," they say in effect, "because he has deserved it; he is now working out the perfectly natural result of some evil which he has committed in the past; what right have I to interfere with the action of the great cosmic law by trying to ameliorate his condition, either on the astral plane or the physical?"

Now the good people who make such suggestions are really, however unconsciously to themselves, exhibiting the most colossal conceit, for their position implies two astounding assumptions; first, that they know exactly what another man's karma has been, and how long it has decreed that his sufferings shall last; and secondly, that they—the insects of a day—could absolutely override the cosmic law and prevent the due working-out of karma by any action of theirs. We may be well assured that the great karmic deities are perfectly well able to manage their business without our assistance, and we need have no fear that any steps we may take can by any possibility cause them the slightest difficulty or uneasiness.

If a man's karma is such that he cannot be helped, then all our well-meant efforts in that direction will fail, though we shall nevertheless have gained good karma for ourselves by making them. What the man's karma has been is no business of ours; our duty is to give help to the utmost of our power, and our right is only to the act; the result is in other and higher hands. How can we tell how a man's account stands? For all we know he may just have exhausted his evil karma, and be at this moment at the very point where a helping hand is needed to give relief and raise him out of his trouble or depression; why should not we have the pleasure and privilege of doing that good deed as well as another? If we can help him, then that fact of itself shows that he has deserved to be helped; but we can never know unless we try. In any case the law of karma will take care of itself, and we need not trouble ourselves about it.

The cases in which assistance is given to mankind by nature-spirits are few. The majority of such creatures shun the haunts of man, and retire before him, disliking his emanations and the perpetual bustle and unrest which he creates all around him. Also except some of their higher orders, they are generally inconsequent and thoughtless—more like happy children at play under exceedingly favourable physical conditions than like grave and responsible entities. Still it sometimes happens that one of them will become attached to a human being and do him many a good turn; but at the present stage of its evolution this department of nature cannot be relied upon for anything like steady co-operation in the work of invisible helpers. For a fuller account of the nature-spirits the reader is referred to the fifth of our Theosophical manuals, and to a book which I wrote on The Hidden Side of Things.

Again, as I have already said, help is sometimes given by those recently departed—those who are still lingering on the astral plane, and still in close touch with earthly affairs, as (probably) in the above-mentioned case of the mother who saved her children from falling down a well. But it will readily be seen that the amount of such help available must naturally be exceedingly limited. The more unselfish and helpful a person is, the less likely is he to be found after death lingering in full consciousness on the lower levels of the astral plane, from which the earth is most readily accessible. In any case, unless he were an exceptionally bad man, his stay within the realm whence alone any interference would be possible would be comparatively short; and although from the heaven-world he may still shed benign influence upon those whom he has loved on earth, it will usually be rather of the nature of a general benediction than a force capable of bringing about definite results in a specific case, such as those which we have been considering.

Again, many of the departed who wish to help those whom they left behind, find themselves quite unable to influence them in any way, since to work from one plane upon an entity on another requires either great sensitiveness on the part of that entity, or a certain amount of knowledge and skill on the part of the operator. Therefore, although instances of apparitions shortly after death are by no means uncommon, it is rare to find one in which the departed person has really done anything useful, or succeeded in impressing what he wished upon the friend or relation whom he visited. There are such cases, of course—a good many of them when we come to put them all together; but they are not numerous compared to the great number of ghosts who have succeeded in showing themselves. So that but little help is usually given to the living by the dead—indeed, as will presently be explained, it is far more common for them to be themselves in need of assistance than to be able to accord it to others.

At present, therefore, the main bulk of the work which has to be done along these lines falls to the share of those living persons who are able to function consciously on the astral plane.

CHAPTER V

THE REALITY OF SUPERPHYSICAL LIFE

IT seems difficult for those who are accustomed only to the ordinary and somewhat materialistic lines of thought of the present century, to believe in and realize fully a condition of perfect consciousness apart from the physical body. Every Christian, at any rate, is bound by the very foundations of his creed to believe that he possesses a soul; but if you suggest to him the possibility that that soul may be a sufficiently real thing to become visible under certain conditions apart from the body either during life or after death, the chances are ten to one that he will scornfully tell you that he does not believe in ghosts, and that such an idea is nothing but an anachronistic survival of an exploded mediæval superstition.

If, therefore, we are at all to comprehend the work of the band of invisible helpers, and perchance ourselves to learn to assist in it, we must shake ourselves free from the trammels of contemporary thought on these subjects, and endeavour to grasp the great truth (now a demonstrated fact to many among us) that the physical body is in simple truth nothing but a vehicle or vesture of the real man. It is put off permanently at death, but it is also put off temporarily every night when we go to sleep—indeed the process of falling asleep consists in this very action of the real man in his astral vehicle slipping out of the physical body.

Again I repeat, this is no mere hypothesis or ingenious supposition. There are many among us who are able to perform (and do perform every day of their lives) this elementary act of magic in full consciousness—who pass from one plane to the other at will; and if that is clearly realized, it will become apparent how grotesquely absurd to them must appear the ordinary unreasoning assertion that such a thing is utterly impossible. It is like telling a man that it is impossible for him to fall asleep, and that if he thinks he has ever done so he is under a hallucination.

Now the man who has not yet developed the link between the astral and physical consciousness is unable to leave his denser body at will, or to recollect most of what happens to him while away from it; but the fact nevertheless remains that he leaves it every time he sleeps, and may be seen by any trained clairvoyant either hovering over it or wandering about at a greater or less distance from it, as the case may be.

The entirely undeveloped person usually floats close above his physical body, scarcely less asleep than it is, comparatively shapeless and inchoate, and it is found that he cannot be drawn away from the immediate neighbourhood of that physical body without causing serious discomfort which would in fact awaken it. As the man evolves, however, his astral body grows more definite and more conscious, and so becomes a fitter vehicle for him. In the case of the majority of intelligent and cultured people the degree of consciousness is already considerable, and a man who is at all spiritually developed is as fully himself in that vehicle as in this denser body.

But though he may be fully conscious on the astral plane during sleep, and able to move about on it freely if he wishes to do so, it does not yet follow that he is ready to join the band of helpers. Most people at this stage are so wrapped up in their own train of thought—usually a continuation of some line taken up in waking hours—that they are like a man in a brown study, so much absorbed as to be practically entirely heedless of all that is going on about them. And in many ways it is well that this is so, for there is much upon the astral plane which might be unnerving and terrifying to one who had not the courage born of full knowledge as to the real nature of all that he would see.

Sometimes a man gradually rouses himself out of this condition—wakes up to the astral world around him, as it were; but more often he remains in that state until someone who is already active there takes him in hand and wakens him. This is, however, not a responsibility to be lightly undertaken, for while it is comparatively easy thus to wake a man up on the astral plane, it is practically impossible, except by a most undesirable exercise of mesmeric influence, to put him to sleep again. So that before a member of the band of workers will thus awaken a dreamer, he must fully satisfy himself that the man's disposition is such that he will make good use of the additional powers that will then be put into his hands, and also that his knowledge and his courage are sufficient to make it reasonably certain that no harm will come to him as a result of the action.

Such awakening so performed will put a man in a position to join if he will the band of those who help mankind. But it must be clearly understood that this does not necessarily or even usually bring with it the power of remembering in the waking consciousness anything which has been done. That capacity has to be attained by the man for himself, and in most cases it does not come for years afterwards—perhaps not even in the same life. But happily this lack of memory in the body in no way impedes the work out of the body; so that, except for the satisfaction to a man of knowing during his waking hours upon what work he has been engaged during his sleep, it is not a matter of importance. What really matters is that the work should be done—not that we should remember who did it.

CHAPTER VI

A TIMELY INTERVENTION

VARIED as is this work on the astral plane, it is all directed to one great end—the furtherance, in however humble a degree, of the processes of evolution. Occasionally it is connected with the development of the lower kingdoms, which it is possible slightly to accelerate under certain conditions. A duty towards these lower kingdoms, elemental as well as animal and vegetable, is distinctly recognized by our Adept leaders, since it is in some cases only through connection with or use by man that their progress takes place.

But naturally by far the largest and most important part of the work is connected with humanity in some way or other. The services rendered are of many and various kinds, but chiefly concerned with man's spiritual development, such physical interventions as are recounted in the earlier part of this book being exceedingly rare. They do, however, occasionally take place, and though it is my wish to emphasize rather the possibility of extending mental and moral help to our fellow-men, it will perhaps be well to give two or three instances in which friends personally known to me have rendered physical assistance to those in sore need of it, in order that it may be seen how these examples from the experience of the helpers gear in with the accounts given by those who have received the supernormal aid—such stories, I mean, as those which are to be found in the literature of so-called “supernatural occurrences.”

In the course of the rebellion in Matabeleland one of our members was sent upon an errand of mercy which may serve as an illustration of the way in which help upon this lower plane has occasionally been given. It seems that one night a certain farmer and his family in that country were sleeping tranquilly in fancied security, quite unaware that only a few miles away relentless hordes of savage foes were lying in ambush maturing fiendish plots of murder and rapine. Our member's business was in some way or other to arouse the sleeping family to a sense of the terrible danger which so unexpectedly menaced them, and she found this by no means an easy matter.

An attempt to impress the idea of imminent peril upon the brain of the farmer failed utterly, and as the urgency of the case seemed to demand strong measures, our friend decided to materialize herself sufficiently to shake the housewife by the shoulder and adjure her to rise and look about her. The moment she saw that she had been successful in attracting attention she vanished, and the farmer's wife has never from that day to this been able to find out which of her neighbours it was who roused her so opportunely, and thus saved the lives of the entire family, who but for this mysterious intervention would undoubtedly have been massacred in their beds half an hour later; nor can she even now understand how this friend in need contrived to make her way in when all the windows and doors were found so securely barred.

Being thus abruptly awakened, the housewife was half inclined to consider the warning as a mere dream; however, she arose and looked round just to see that all was right, and fortunate it was that she did so, for though she found nothing amiss indoors she had no sooner thrown open a shutter than she saw the sky red with a distant conflagration. She at once roused her husband and the rest of her family, and owing to this timely notice they were able to escape to a place of concealment near at hand just before the arrival of the horde of savages, who destroyed the house and ravaged the fields indeed, but were disappointed of the human prey which they had expected. The feelings of the rescuer may be imagined when she read in the newspaper some time afterwards an account of the providential deliverance of this family.

CHAPTER VII

THE "ANGEL STORY"

ANOTHER instance of intervention on the physical plane which occurred a short time ago makes a beautiful little story, though this time only one life was saved. It needs, however, a few words of preliminary explanation. Among our band of helpers here in Europe are two who were brothers long ago in ancient Egypt, and are still warmly attached to one another. In this present incarnation there is a wide difference in age between them, one being advanced in middle life, while the other was at that time a mere child in the physical body, though an ego of considerable advancement and promise. Naturally it falls to the lot of the elder to train and guide the younger in the occult work to which they are so heartily devoted, and as both are fully conscious and active on the astral plane they spend most of the time during which their grosser bodies are asleep in labouring together under the direction of their common Master, and giving to both living and dead such help as is within their power.

I will quote the story of the particular incident which I wish to relate from a letter written by the elder of the two helpers immediately after its occurrence, as the description there given is more vivid and picturesque than any account in the third person could possibly be.

"We were going about quite other business, when Cyril suddenly cried: 'What's that?' for we heard a terrible scream of pain or fright. In a moment we were on the spot, and found that a boy of about eleven or twelve had fallen over a cliff on to some rocks below, and was very badly hurt. He had broken a leg and an arm, poor fellow, but what was still worse was a dreadful cut in the thigh, from which blood was pouring in a torrent. Cyril cried: 'Let us help him quick, or he'll die!'

"In emergencies of this kind one has to think quickly. There were clearly two things to be done; that bleeding must be stopped, and physical help must be procured. I was obliged to materialize either Cyril or myself, for we wanted physical hands at once to tie a bandage, and besides it seemed better that the poor boy should see someone standing by him in his trouble. I felt that while undoubtedly he would be more at home with Cyril than with me, I should probably be more readily able to procure help than Cyril would, so the division of labour was obvious.

"The plan worked capitally. I materialized Cyril instantly (he does not know yet how to do it for himself), and told him to take the boy's neck-vein and tie it round the thigh, and twist a stick through it. 'Won't it hurt him terribly?' said Cyril; but he did it, and the blood stopped flowing. The injured boy seemed half unconscious, and could scarcely speak, but he looked up at the shining little form bending so anxiously over him, and asked: 'Be you an Angel, master?' Cyril smiled so prettily, and replied: 'No, I'm only a boy, but I've come to help you'; and then I left him to comfort the sufferer while I rushed off for the boy's mother, who lived about a mile away.

"The trouble I had to force into that woman's head the conviction that something was wrong, and that she must go and see about it, you would never believe; but at last she threw down the pan she was cleaning, and said aloud: 'Well, I don't know what's come over me, but I must go and find the boy.' When she once started I was able to guide her without much difficulty, though all the time I was holding Cyril together by will-power, lest the poor child's Angel should suddenly vanish from before his eyes.

"You see, when you materialize a form you are changing matter from its natural state into another—temporarily opposing the cosmic will, as it were;

and if you take your mind off it for one half-second, back it flies into its original condition like a flash of lightning. So I could not give more than half my attention to that woman, but still I dragged her along somehow, and as soon as she came round the corner of the cliff I let Cyril disappear; but she had seen him, and now that village has one of the best-attested stories of angelic intervention on record!

"The accident happened in the early morning, and the same evening I looked in (astrally) upon the family to see how matters were going on. The poor boy's leg and arm had been set, and the great cut bandaged, and he lay in bed looking very pale and weak, but evidently going to recover in time. The mother had a couple of neighbours in, and was telling them the story; and a curious tale it sounded to one who knew the real facts.

"She explained, in very many words, how she couldn't tell what it was, but something came over her all in a minute like, making her feel something had happened to the boy, and she must go out and see after him; how at first she thought it was nonsense, and tried to throw off the feeling, 'but it warn't no use—she just had to go.' She told how she didn't know what made her go round by that cliff more than any other way, but it just happened so, and as she turned round the corner there she saw him lying propped up against a rock, and kneeling beside him was the 'beautifullest child ever she saw, dressed all in white and shining, with rosy cheeks and lovely brown eyes'; and how he smiled at her 'so heavenly like,' and then all in a moment he was not there, and at first she was so startled she didn't know what to think; and then all at once she felt what it was, and fell on her knees and thanked God for sending one of His Angels to help her poor boy.

"Then she told how when she lifted him to carry him home she wanted to take off the handkerchief that was cutting into his poor leg so, but he would not let her, because he said the Angel had tied it and said he was not to touch it; and how when she told the doctor this afterwards he explained to her that if she had unfastened it the boy would certainly have died.

"Then she repeated the boy's part of the tale—how the moment after he fell this lovely little Angel came to him (he knew it was an Angel because he knew there had been nobody in sight for half a mile round when he was at the top of the cliff just before—only he could not understand why it hadn't any wings, and why it said it was only a boy)—how it lifted him against the rock and tied up his leg, and then began to talk to him and tell him he need not be frightened, because somebody was gone to fetch mother, and she would be there directly; how it kissed him and tried to make him comfortable, and how its soft, warm, little hand held his all the time, while it told him strange, beautiful stories which he could not clearly remember, but he knew they were very good, because he had almost forgotten he was hurt until he saw mother coming; and how then it assured him he would soon be well again, and smiled and squeezed his hand, and then somehow it was gone.

“Since then there has been quite a religious revival in that village! Their minister has told them that so signal an interposition of divine Providence must have been meant as a sign to them, to rebuke scoffers and to prove the truth of holy Scripture and of the Christian religion—and nobody seems to see the colossal conceit involved in such an astonishing proposition.

“But the effect on the boy has been undoubtedly good, morally as well as physically; by all accounts he was a careless enough young scamp before, but now he feels ‘his Angel’ may be near him at any time, and he will never do or say anything rough or coarse or angry, lest it should see or hear. The one great desire of his life is that some day he may see it again, and he knows that when he dies its lovely face will be the first to greet him on the other side.”

A beautiful and pathetic little story, truly. The moral drawn from the occurrence by the village and its minister is perhaps somewhat of a non sequitur; yet the testimony to the existence of at least something beyond this material plane must surely do the people more good than harm, and after all the mother's conclusion from what she saw was perfectly correct, though more accurate knowledge would probably have led her to express it a little differently.

An interesting fact afterwards discovered by the investigations of the writer of the letter throws a curious sidelight upon the reasons underlying such incidents. It was found that the two boys had met before, and that some thousands of years ago he who fell from the cliff had been the slave of the other, and had once saved his young master's life at the risk of his own, and had been liberated in consequence; and now, long afterwards, the master not only repays the debt in kind, but also gives his former slave a high ideal and an inducement to morality of life which will probably change the whole course of his future evolution. So true is it that no good deed ever goes unrewarded by karma, however tardy it may seem in its action—that

Though the mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small;
Though with patience stands He waiting,
With exactness grinds He all.

CHAPTER VIII

THE STORY OF A FIRE

ANOTHER piece of work done by the same boy Cyril furnishes an almost exact parallel to some of the stories from the books which I have given in earlier pages. He and his older friend, it seems, were passing along in the prosecution of their usual work one night, when they noticed the fierce glare of a big fire below them, and promptly dived down to see whether they could be of any use.

It was a great hotel which was in flames, a huge caravanseraï on the edge of a great lake. The house, many stories in height, formed three sides of a square round a sort of garden, planted with trees and flowers, while the lake formed the fourth side. The two wings ran down to the lake, the big bay windows which terminated them almost projecting over the water, so as to leave only quite a narrow passageway under them at the two sides.

The front and wings were built round inside wells, which contained also the lattice-work shafts of the lifts, so that when once the fire broke out, it spread with almost incredible rapidity, and before our friends saw it on their astral journey all the middle floors in each of the three great blocks were in flames. Fortunately the inmates—except one little boy—had already been rescued, though some of them had sustained serious burns and other injuries.

This little fellow had been forgotten in one of the upper rooms of the left wing, for his parents were out at a ball, and knew nothing of the fire, while naturally enough no one else thought of the lad till it was far too late. The fire had gained such a hold on the middle floors of that wing that nothing could have been done, even if anyone had remembered him, as his room faced on to the inner garden which has been mentioned, so that he was completely cut off from all outside help. Besides, he was not even aware of his danger, for the dense, suffocating smoke had so gradually filled the room that his sleep had grown deeper and deeper, till he was all but stupefied.

In this state he was discovered by Cyril, who seems to be specially attracted towards children in need or danger. He first tried to make some of the people remember the boy, but in vain; and in any case it seemed scarcely possible that they could have helped him, so that it was soon evident that this was merely a waste of time. The older helper then materialized Cyril, as before, in the room, and set him to work to awaken and rouse up the more than half-stupefied child. After a good deal of difficulty this was accomplished to some extent, but the boy remained in a half-dazed, semi-conscious condition through all that followed, so that he needed to be pushed and pulled about, guided and helped at every turn.

The two boys first crept out of the room into the central passage which ran through the wing, and then, finding that the smoke and the flames beginning to come through the floor made it impassable for a physical body, Cyril took the other boy back into the room again and out of the window on a stone ledge, about a foot wide, which ran along the block just below the windows. Along this he managed to guide his companion, half balancing himself on the extreme edge of the ledge, and half floating on air, but always placing himself outside of the other, so as to keep him from dizziness and prevent him from feeling afraid of a fall.

Towards the end of the block nearest the lake, in which direction the fire seemed less developed, they climbed in through an open window and again reached the passage, hoping to find the staircase at that end still passable. But it, too, was full of flame and smoke; so they crawled back along the passage, Cyril advising his companion to keep his mouth close to the ground, till they reached the latticed cage of the lift running down the long well in the centre of the block.

The lift of course was at the bottom, but they managed to clamber down the lattice work inside the cage till they stood on the roof of the elevator itself. Here they found themselves blocked, but luckily Cyril discovered a doorway opening from the cage of the lift on to a sort of entresol just above the ground floor. Through this they reached a passage, which they crossed, the little boy being half-stifled by the smoke; then they made their way through one of the rooms opposite, and finally, clambering out of the window, found themselves on the top of the verandah which ran all along in front of the ground floor, between it and the garden.

Thence it was easy enough to swarm down one of the pillars and reach the garden itself; but even there the heat was intense, and the danger, when the walls should fall, very considerable. So Cyril tried to conduct his charge round the end first of one, then of the other wing; but in both cases the flames had burst through, and the narrow, overhung passages were quite impassable. Finally they took refuge in one of the pleasure boats which were moored to the steps of the quay at the side of the garden next the lake, and, casting loose, rowed out on to the water.

Cyril intended to row round past the burning wing and land the boy whom he had saved; but when they were some little way out, they fell in with a passing lake steamer, and were seen—for the whole scene was lit up by the glare of the burning hotel, till everything was as plain as in broad daylight. The steamer came alongside the boat to take them off; but instead of the two boys they had seen, the crew found only one—for his older friend had promptly allowed Cyril to slip back into his astral form, dissipating the denser matter which had made for the time a material body, and he was therefore now invisible.

A careful search was made, of course, but no trace of the second boy could be found, and so it was concluded that he must have fallen overboard and been drowned just as they came alongside. The child who had been rescued fell into a dead faint as soon as he was safe on board, so they could extract no information from him, and when he did recover, all he could say was that he had seen the other boy the moment before they came alongside, and then knew nothing more.

The steamer was bound down the lake to a place some two days' sail distant, and it was a week or so before the rescued boy could be restored to his parents, who of course thought that he had perished in the flames, for though an effort was made to impress on their minds the fact that their son had been saved, it was found impossible to convey the idea to them, so it may be imagined how great was the joy of the meeting.

The boy is still well and happy, and is never weary of relating his wonderful adventure. Many a time he has regretted that the kind friend who saved him should have perished so mysteriously at the very moment when all the danger seemed over at last. Indeed, he has even ventured to suggest that perhaps he didn't perish after all—that perhaps he was a fairy prince; but of course this idea elicits nothing but tolerant smiles of superiority from his elders. The karmic link between him and his preserver has not yet been traced, but no doubt there must be one somewhere.

CHAPTER IX

MATERIALIZATION AND REPERCUSSION

ON meeting with a story such as this, students often enquire whether the invisible helper is perfectly safe amidst these scenes of deadly peril—whether, for example, this boy who was materialized in order to save another from a burning house was not himself in some danger—whether his physical body would not have suffered in any way by repercussion if his materialized form had passed through the flames, or fallen from the high ledge on the edge of which he walked so unconcernedly. In fact, since we know that in many cases the connection between a materialized form and a physical body is sufficiently close to produce repercussion, might it not have occurred in this case?

Now this subject of repercussion is exceedingly abstruse and difficult, and we are by no means yet in a position fully to explain its remarkable phenomena; indeed, in order to understand the matter perfectly, it would probably be necessary to comprehend the laws of sympathetic vibration on more planes than one. Still, we do know by observation some of the conditions which permit its action, and some which definitely exclude it, and I think we are warranted in saying that it was absolutely impossible here.

To see why this is so we must first remember that there are at least three well-defined varieties of materialization, as anyone who has at all an extended experience of spiritualism will be aware. I am not concerned at the moment to enter upon any explanation as to how these three varieties are respectively produced, but am merely stating the indubitable fact of their existence.

1. There is the materialization which, though tangible, is not visible to ordinary physical sight. Of this nature are the unseen hands which so often clasp one's arm or stroke one's face at a séance, which sometimes carry physical objects through the air or make raps upon the table—though of course both these latter phenomena may easily be produced without a materialized hand at all.

2. There is the materialization which though visible is not tangible—the spirit-form through which one's hand passes as through empty air. In some cases this variety is obviously misty and impalpable, but in others its appearance is so entirely normal that its solidity is never doubted until someone endeavours to grasp it.

3. There is the perfect materialization which is both visible and tangible—which not only bears the outward semblance of your departed friend, but shakes you cordially by the hand with the very clasp you know so well.

Now while there is a good deal of evidence to show that repercussion takes place under certain conditions in the case of this third kind of materialization, it is by no means so certain that it can occur with the first or second class. In the case of the boy-helper it is probable that the materialization would not be of the third type, since the greatest care is always taken not to expend more force than is absolutely necessary to produce whatever result may be required, and it is obvious that less energy would be used in the production of the more partial forms which we have called the first and second classes. The probability is that only the arm with which the boy held his little companion would be solid to the touch, and that the rest of his body, though looking perfectly natural, would have proved far less palpable if it had been tested.

But, apart from this probability, there is another point to be considered. When a full materialization takes place, whether the subject be living or dead, physical matter of some sort has to be gathered together for the purpose. At a spiritualistic séance this matter is obtained by drawing largely upon the etheric double of the medium—and sometimes even upon his physical body also, since cases are on record in which his weight has been very considerably decreased while manifestations of this character were taking place.

This method is employed by the directing entities of the séance simply because when an available medium is within reach it is much the easiest way in which a materialization can be produced; and the consequence is that a very close connection is thus set up between that medium and the materialized body, so that the phenomenon which (although only imperfectly understanding it) we call repercussion, occurs in its clearest form. If, for example, the hands of the materialized body be rubbed with chalk, that chalk will afterwards be found on the hands of the medium, even though he may have been all the time carefully locked up in a cabinet under circumstances which absolutely preclude any suspicion of fraud. If any injury be inflicted upon the materialized form, that injury will be accurately reproduced upon the corresponding part of the medium's body; while sometimes food of which the spirit-form has partaken will be found to have passed into the body of the medium—at least that happened in one case at any rate within my own experience.

It would be far otherwise, however, in the case which we have been describing. Cyril was thousands of miles from his sleeping physical body, and it would therefore be quite impossible for his friend to draw etheric matter from it, while the regulations under which all pupils of the great Masters of Wisdom perform their work of helping man would assuredly prevent him, even for the noblest purpose, from putting such a strain upon anyone else's body. Besides, it would be quite unnecessary, for the far less dangerous method invariably employed by the helpers when materialization seems desirable would be ready to his hand—the condensation from the circumambient ether, or even from the physical air, of such amount of matter as may be requisite. This feat, though no doubt beyond the power of the average entity manifesting at a séance, presents no difficulty to a student of occult chemistry.

But mark the difference in the result obtained. In the case of the medium we have a materialized form in the closest possible connection with the physical body, made out of its very substance, and therefore capable of producing all the phenomena of repercussion. In the case of the helper we have indeed an exact reproduction of the physical body; but it is created by a mental effort out of matter entirely foreign to that body, and is no more capable of acting upon it by repercussion than an ordinary marble statue of the man would be.

Thus it is that a passage through the flames or a fall from a high window-ledge would have had no terrors for the boy-helper, and that on another occasion a member of the band, though materialized, was able without any inconvenience to the physical body to go down in a sinking vessel (see ch. XV).

In both the incidents of his work that have been described above, it will have been noticed that the boy Cyril was unable to materialize himself, and that the operation had to be performed for him by an older friend. One more of his experiences is worth relating, for it gives us a case in which by intensity of pity and determination of will he was able to show himself—a case somewhat parallel to that previously related of the mother whose love enabled her somehow to manifest herself in order to save her children's lives.

Inexplicable as it may seem, there is no doubt whatever of the existence in nature of this stupendous power of will over matter of all planes, so that if only the power be great enough, practically any result may be produced by its direct action, without any knowledge or even thought on the part of the man exercising that will as to how it is to do its work. We have had plenty of evidence that this power holds good in the case of materialization, although ordinarily it is an art which must be learnt just like any other. Assuredly an average man on the astral plane could no more materialize himself without having previously learnt how to do it than the average man on this plane could play the violin without having previously learnt it; but there are exceptional cases, as will be seen from the following narrative.

CHAPTER X

THE TWO BROTHERS

THIS story has been told by a pen of far greater dramatic capability than mine, and with a wealth of detail for which I have here no space, in the Theosophical Review of November, 1897, p. 229. To that account I would refer the reader, since my own description of the case will be a mere outline, as brief as is consistent with clearness. The names given are of course fictitious, but the incidents are related with scrupulous accuracy.

Our dramatis personae are two brothers, the sons of a country gentleman—Lancelot, aged fourteen, and Walter, aged eleven—very good boys of the ordinary healthy, manly type, like hundreds of others in this fair realm, with no obvious psychic qualifications of any sort, except the possession of a good deal of Celtic blood. Perhaps the most remarkable feature about them was the intensity of the affection that existed between them, for they were simply inseparable—neither would go anywhere without the other, and the younger idolized the elder as only a younger boy can.

One unlucky day Lancelot was thrown from his pony and killed, and for Walter the world became empty. The child's grief was so real and terrible that he could neither eat nor sleep, and his mother and nurse were at their wits' end as to what to do for him. He seemed deaf alike to persuasion and blame; when they told him that grief was wicked, and that his brother was in heaven, he simply answered that he could not be certain of that, and that even if it were true, he knew that Lancelot could no more be happy in heaven without him than he could on earth without Lancelot.

Incredible as it may sound, the poor child was actually dying of grief, and what made the case even more pathetic was the fact that, all unknown to him, his brother stood at his side all the time, fully conscious of his misery, and himself half-distracted at the failure of his repeated attempts to touch him or speak to him.

Affairs were still in this most pitiable condition on the third evening after the accident, when Cyril's attention was drawn to the two brothers—he cannot tell how. "He just happened to be passing," he says; yet surely the will of the Lords of Compassion guided him to the scene. Poor Walter lay exhausted yet sleepless—alone in his desolation, so far as he knew, though all the time his sorrowing brother stood beside him. Lancelot, free from the chains of the flesh, could see and hear Cyril, so obviously the first thing to do was to soothe his pain with a promise of friendship and help in communicating with his brother.

As soon as the dead boy's mind was thus cheered with hope, Cyril turned to the living child, and tried with all his strength to impress upon his brain the knowledge that his brother stood beside him, not dead, but living and loving as of yore. But all his efforts were in vain; the dull apathy of grief so filled poor Walter's mind that no suggestion from without could enter, and Cyril knew not what to do. Yet so deeply was he moved by the sad sight, so intense was his sympathy and so firm his determination to help in some way or other at any cost of strength to himself, that somehow (even to this day he cannot tell how) he found himself able to touch and to speak to the heart-broken child.

Putting aside Walter's questions as to who he was and how he came there, he went straight to the point, telling him that his brother stood beside him, trying hard to make him hear his constantly repeated assurances that he was not dead, but living and yearning to help and comfort him. Little but Cyril's eager insistence vanquished his doubts at last, and he said:

"O! I do believe you, because you're so kind; but if I could only see him, then I should know, then I should be quite sure; and if I could only hear his voice telling me he was happy, I shouldn't mind a bit his going away again afterwards."

Young though he was at the work, Cyril knew enough to be aware that Walter's wish was one not ordinarily granted, and was beginning regretfully to tell him so, when suddenly he felt a Presence that all the helpers know, and though no word was spoken it was borne in upon his mind that instead of what he had meant to say, he was to promise Walter the boon his heart desired. "Wait till I come back," he said, "and you shall see him then." And then—he vanished.

That one touch from the Master had shown him what to do and how to do it, and he rushed to fetch the older friend who had so often helped him before. This older man had not yet retired for the night, but on hearing Cyril's hurried summons, he lost no time in accompanying him, and in a few minutes they were back at Walter's bedside. The poor child was just beginning to believe it all a lovely dream, and his delight and relief when Cyril reappeared were beautiful to see. Yet how much more beautiful was the scene a moment later, when, in obedience to a word from the Master, the elder man materialized the eager Lancelot, and the living and the dead stood hand in hand once more!

Now in very truth for both the brothers had sorrow been turned into joy unspeakable, and again and again they both declared that now they should never feel sad any more, because they knew that death had no power to part them. Nor was their gladness damped even when Cyril explained carefully to them, at his older friend's suggestion, that this strange physical reunion would not be repeated, but that all day long Lancelot would be near Walter, even though the latter could not see him, and every night Walter would slip out of his body and be consciously with his brother once more.

Hearing this, poor weary Walter sank to sleep at once and proved its truth, and was amazed to find with what hitherto unknown rapidity he and his brother could fly together from one to another of their old familiar haunts. Cyril thoughtfully warned him that he would probably forget most of his freer life when he awoke next day; but by rare good fortune he did not forget, as so many of us do. Perhaps the shock of the great joy had somewhat aroused the latent psychic faculty which belongs to the Celtic blood; at any rate he forgot no single detail of all that had happened, and next morning he burst upon the house of mourning with a wondrous tale which suited it but ill.

His parents thought that grief had turned his brain, and, since he is now the heir, they have been watching long and anxiously for further symptoms of insanity, which happily they have not found. They still think him a monomaniac on this point, though they fully recognize that his "delusion" has saved his life; but his old nurse (who is a Catholic) is firm in her belief that all he says is true—that the Lord Jesus, who was once a Child Himself, took pity on that other child as he lay dying of grief, and sent one of His Angels to bring his brother back to him from the dead as a reward for a love which was stronger than death. Sometimes popular superstition comes a good deal nearer to the heart of things than does educated scepticism!

Nor does the story end here, for the good work begun that night is still progressing, and none can say how far the influence of that one act may ramify. Walter's astral consciousness, once having been thus thoroughly awakened, remains in activity; every morning he brings back into his physical brain the memory of his night's adventures with his brother; every night they meet their dear friend Cyril, from whom they have learned so much about the wonderful new world that has opened before them, and the other worlds to come that lie higher yet. Under Cyril's guidance they also—the living and the dead alike—have become eager and earnest members of the band of helpers; and probably for years to come—until Lancelot's vigorous young astral body disintegrates—many a dying child will have cause to be grateful to these three who are trying to pass on to others something of the joy that they have themselves received.

Nor is it to the dead alone that these new converts have been of use, for they have sought and found some other living children who show consciousness on the astral plane during sleep; and one at least of those whom they have thus brought to Cyril has already proved a valuable little recruit to the children's band, as well as a kind little friend down here on the physical plane.

Those to whom all these ideas are new sometimes find it difficult to understand how children can be of any use in the astral world. Seeing, they would say, that the astral body of a child must be undeveloped, and the ego thus limited by childhood on the astral as well as the physical plane, in what way could such an ego be of use, or be able to help towards the spiritual, mental and moral evolution of humanity, which we are told is the chief concern of the helpers?

When first such a question was asked, shortly after the publication of one of these stories in our magazine, I sent it to Cyril himself, to see what he would say to it, and his answer was this:

"It is quite true, as the writer says, that I am only a boy, and know very little yet, and that I shall be much more useful when I have learnt more. But I am able to do a little even now, because there are so many people who have learnt nothing about Theosophy yet, though they may know very much more than I do about everything else. And you see when you want to get to a certain place, a little boy who knows the way can do more for you than a hundred wise men who don't know it."

It may be added that when even a child has been awakened upon the astral plane, the development of the astral body proceeds so rapidly that he is very soon in a position upon that plane but little inferior to that of the awakened adult, and is of course much in advance, so far as usefulness is concerned, of the wisest man who is as yet unawakened. But unless the ego expressing himself through that child-body possesses the necessary qualification of a determined yet loving disposition, and has clearly manifested it in his previous lives, no occultist will take the serious responsibility of awakening him upon the astral plane. When, however, their karma is such that it is possible for them to be thus aroused, children often prove most efficient helpers, and throw themselves into their work with a whole-souled devotion which is beautiful to see. And so is fulfilled once more the ancient prophecy "a little child shall lead them."

Another question that suggests itself to one's mind in reading this last story of the two brothers is this: since Cyril was somehow able to materialize himself by sheer force of love and pity and strength of will, is it not strange that Lancelot, who had been trying so much longer to communicate, had not succeeded in doing the same thing?

Well, there is of course no difficulty in seeing why poor Lancelot was unable to communicate with his brother, for that inability is simply the normal condition of affairs; the wonder is that Cyril was able to materialize himself, not that Lancelot was not. Not only, however, was the feeling probably stronger in Cyril's case, but he also knew exactly what he wanted to do—knew that such a thing as materialization was a possibility, and had some general idea as to how it was done—while Lancelot naturally knew nothing of all this then, though he does now.

CHAPTER XI

A SUICIDE PREVENTED

ONE evening I was dictating in my room at Adyar a little later than usual, when one of our young helpers called (by appointment) in his astral body to accompany me on my night's round. I asked him to wait for a few minutes while I finished the piece of work upon which I was then engaged, so he circled about the neighbourhood a little, and hovered over the Bay of Bengal. Seeing a passing steamer he swooped down upon it (in mere curiosity, as he says) and almost immediately his attention was attracted by a horrible grey aura of deep depression projecting through the closed door of a cabin. True to his instructions, on sight of such a distress-signal he at once proceeded to investigate further, and on entering the room he found a man sitting on the side of a bunk with a pistol in his hand, which he raised to his forehead and then laid down again. The young helper felt that something ought to be done promptly, but being new to the work he did not quite know how to act for the best, so he was in my room again in a flash (and in a great state of excitement) crying:

"Come at once; here is a man going to kill himself!"

I stopped dictating, threw my body on to a sofa, and accompanied him to the ship. As soon as I grasped the state of affairs, I decided to temporize, as I had to return and finish the work upon which I had been engaged; so I strongly impressed upon the would-be suicide's mind that this was not the time for his rash act—that he should wait until the middle watch, when he would not be disturbed. If I had tried to impress the thought of the wickedness of suicide upon his brain he would have begun to argue, and I had no time for that; but he instantly accepted the idea of postponement. I left my young assistant in charge, telling him to fly at once for me if the man so much as opened the drawer in which I had made him put the pistol. Then I returned to my body and did a little more dictation, bringing the work to a point where it could be conveniently left for the night.

As twelve o'clock approached I returned to relieve my young helper, whom I found in a very anxious frame of mind, though he reported that nothing particular had occurred. The would-be suicide was still in the same state of depression, and his resolution had not wavered. I then proceeded to investigate the reasons in his mind, and found that he was one of the ship's officers, and that the immediate cause of his depression was the fact that he had been guilty of some defalcations in connection with the ship's accounts, which would inevitably be shortly discovered, and he was unable to face the consequent exposure and disgrace. It was in order to stand well with a certain young lady and to make extravagant presents to her that he had needed, or thought he needed, the money; and while the actual amount involved was by no means a large one, it was still far beyond his power to replace it.

He seemed a good-hearted young fellow, with a fairly clean record behind him, and (except for his infatuation about the girl, which had led him into so serious an error) a sensible and honourable man. Glancing back hurriedly over his history to find some lever by which to move him from his culpable determination, I found that the most powerful thought for that purpose was that of an aged mother at home, to whom he was dear beyond all others. It was easy to impress the memory of her form strongly upon him, to make him take out a portrait of her, and then to show him how this act would ruin the remainder of her life, by plunging her into inextinguishable sorrow, not only because of her loss of him on the physical plane, but also because of her doubts as to the fate of his soul hereafter. It was necessary also to discover a way of escape from the dilemma in which he had so foolishly placed himself; so I examined the captain of the steamer and, finding him a man of understanding and of kindly heart, it seemed to me feasible to suggest an appeal to him.

This then was the idea which I put into the young man's mind—that, in order to avoid the awful sorrow which his suicide must inevitably bring to the heart of his mother, he must face the almost impossible alternative of going to his captain, laying the whole case before him, and asking for a temporary suspension of judgment until he should prove himself to be worthy of such clemency. So the young officer actually went, then and there, in the dead of night. A sailor is ever on the alert, and it was not difficult to arrange that the captain should be awake and should appear at his door just at the right moment. The whole story was told in less than half an hour, and with much fatherly advice from the kind captain the matter was settled; the amount appropriated was replaced by the captain, to be repaid to him by the officer in such instalments as he could afford, and thus a young and promising life was saved.

CHAPTER XII

THE LOST BOY

TO show the diversity of the astral work that opens before us, I will mention another case in which the same young neophyte was engaged within a few days of that described above.

Every astral worker has always on hand a certain number of regular cases, who for the time need nightly visits, just as a doctor has a daily round in which he calls upon a number of patients; so when neophytes are delivered into my charge for instruction I always take them with me on those rounds, just as an older doctor might take with him a younger man in order that he might gain experience by watching how cases are treated. Of course, there is other definite teaching to be given; the beginner must pass the tests of earth, water, air and fire; he must learn by constant practice how to distinguish between thought-forms and living beings; how to know and use the 2,401 varieties of elemental essence; how to materialize himself or others when necessary; how to deal with the thousands of emergencies which are constantly arising; above all, he must learn never under any circumstances to lose his balance or allow himself to feel the least tinge of fear, no matter how alarming or unusual may be the manifestations which occur. The primary necessity for an astral worker is always to remain master of the situation, whatever it may be. He must also be full of love and of eager desire to help; but these qualifications I do not need to teach, for unless the candidate already possessed them he would not be sent to me.

I was on my way one night to visit certain of my regular cases, and was passing over a picturesque and hilly part of the country. My attendant neophytes were ranging about and sweeping over areas of adjoining land, as neophytes will—just as a fox-terrier runs on ahead and returns again and makes excursions on each side, and covers three or four times the ground trodden by the man whom he accompanies. My young friend, who had a few days before saved the life of the officer, suddenly came rushing up in his usual impulsive way to say that he had discovered something wrong—a boy dying down under the ground, as he put it.

Investigation soon revealed a child of perhaps eight years old lost in the inmost recesses of a huge cavern, far from the light of day, apparently dying of hunger, thirst and despair. The case reminded me somewhat of the Angel story in chapter vii, and seemed to require much the same kind of treatment; so on this occasion, as on that, I materialized the young helper—not Cyril this time, but a boy of another race. In this instance it was necessary also to provide a light, as we were physically in utter darkness; so the half-fainting child was roused from his stupor by finding a boy with an amazingly brilliant lantern bending over him. The first and most pressing need was obviously water, and there was a rill not far away, though the exhausted child could not have reached it. We had no cup; we could have made one, of course, but my eager neophyte did not think of that, but rushed off and brought a drink of water in his hollowed hands. This revived the child so much that he was able to sit up, and after two more similarly provided draughts he could speak a little.

He said that he lived in the next valley, but on rising through the earth and looking round (leaving my materialized boy to cheer the sufferer, so that he should not feel deserted) I could not find anything answering to his description, and I had to return to the child and make him think of his home, so as to have a mental picture of it, and then issue forth again with the image photographed in my mind. Then I found the house, but further away than he had described it. There were several people there, and I tried to impress them with the child's predicament, but was unfortunately unsuccessful; not one of them seemed in the least receptive, and I could not convey my ideas clearly to them. They were much troubled about the child's absence, and had been seeking for him; indeed they had just sent to gather together some neighbours from their valleys to make a more thorough search; and perhaps it may have been partly because of their preoccupation that they were hopelessly unimpressible.

Long enough persistence would probably have broken down the barriers, but the child's state left us no time for that, so I abandoned the task and looked round for available food to dematerialize, for as it was the child's own home I felt that he had a right to it, and that it would not be dishonest to take it. I hurriedly selected some bread, some cheese, and two fine big apples, and hastened back to the cave, and rematerialized this miscellaneous plunder in the eager hands of my neophyte, who proceeded to feed the child. The latter was soon able to attend to his own wants, and quickly finished every scrap that I had brought, and asked for more. I feared lest too much, after a prolonged fast, should do more harm than good, so I told my representative to say that he had no more, and that we must now try to climb out of the cave.

With a view to that I suggested to my boy to ask the other how he came to be there. His story was that he had been rambling about on the hills in a valley near his home, and had observed a small cave in the hill-side, which he had never noticed before. He naturally went in to investigate, but he had not walked more than a few yards when the floor of the cave gave way under him, and he was precipitated into a far vaster cavern beneath. From his account he must have been stunned for a time, for when he "awoke," as he put it, it was quite dark, and he could not see the hole through which he had fallen. We afterwards inspected the spot and wondered that he had not been badly hurt, for the fall was considerable; but it had been broken for him by the fact that a mass of soft earth had fallen underneath him.

It was impossible to bring him up that way, for the sides of the cave were smooth and perpendicular; besides, he had wandered for two whole days among the galleries and was now some miles from that spot. After a good deal of prospecting we found, within a reasonable distance, a place where a little stream passed from the cave into the open air on the hill-side; the child, now strengthened by food and drink, was able to walk there, and the two boys soon enlarged the opening with their hands so that he was able to crawl out. It was evident that now he would be able to find his way home in any case, and we also hoped to be able to influence some of the searchers to come in that direction, so this seemed a favourable opportunity to part company.

The father had a plan of search fixed in his mind—a scheme of examining the valleys in a certain order—and no suggestion of ours could make him deviate from it; but fortunately there was in the party a dog who proved more impressionable, and when he seized the trouser-leg of one of the farm-men and tried to draw him in our direction, the man thought there might be some reason for it, and so yielded, and followed the dog. Thus by the time that the child was safely out of the cave, the man and dog were already within a few miles. The child naturally begged his mysterious newly-found friend to accompany him home, and clung to him with touching gratitude, but the helper was obliged gently to tell him that he could not do that, as he had other business; but he conveyed him to the top of a ridge from which he could see the farm-hand far away on the other side of the valley. A shout soon attracted his attention, and as soon as that was certain, our young helper said good-bye to the boy whom he had rescued, sent him off running teebly towards his friends, and then himself promptly dematerialized.

The small boy who was helped can never have had the slightest idea that his rescuer was anything but purely physical; he asked one or two inconvenient questions, but was easily diverted from dangerous ground. Perhaps his relations, when he came to tell his story, found more difficulty than he did in accounting for the presence in a lonely place of a casual stranger of decidedly non-bucolic appearance; but at any rate it will be impossible in this case to bring any definite evidence of non-physical intervention.

CHAPTER XIII

THE STORY OF IVY

THE heroine of this story, whose name is Ivy, is one of our best workers on the astral plane. She was during earth life a member of one of our Lotus Circles, and her work is a fine example of the good which such circles can do. She was a bright and lively girl, musical, artistic and athletic—a clever elocutionist too; but above all a thoroughly good girl, kindly and affectionate, and willing to take any amount of trouble to help others; and a person who has that characteristic on the physical plane always makes a good helper on the astral. I feel sure that she would have led an exemplary and useful life on this plane if her karma had worked that way, but it is not conceivable that in that case she could have found the opportunity even during a long life to do anything at all approaching to the amount of good which she has even already done on the astral plane since her death. I need not go into details of that; it is enough to say that when she was scarcely eighteen she was drowned in a yachting accident. She came straight to Cyril, who is her special guru, as soon as she recovered her consciousness, and as soon as she had comforted her relations and friends she demanded to be trained for regular work. This was one of her most pleasing characteristics, and although she had great originality and ingenuity she was yet very humble about her own qualifications, most willing to be taught exactly how to work, and eager to learn and understand.

She is especially fond of children, and her field of usefulness has lain specially with girls of her own age and younger. She has been keenly interested in making thought-forms for people, and has acquired exceptional powers along that line. She takes up cases of children who are frightened at night, and of others who have besetting thoughts of pride, jealousy or sensuality. In most of these she finds out the child's highest ideal or greatest hero or heroine, makes a strong thought-form of that ideal, and sets it to act as a guardian angel to the child.

Then she makes it a regular business to go round at stated times revivifying all these thought-forms, so as to keep them always thoroughly up to their work. In this way she has been actually the salvation of many children. I know of one case in which she was able to check incipient insanity, and two others in which, but for her ministrations, early death would have certainly ensued, besides many others in which character has been improved beyond all recognition. Indeed, it is impossible to speak too highly of the good work which she has done in that way.

Another of her lines of activity will appeal to those who have not forgotten their own childhood. Many children live constantly in a sort of rosy day-dream—"telling themselves stories," they sometimes call it. The little boy fancies himself the hero of all sorts of thrilling adventures—the central figure in scenes of glory, naval, military or athletic; the little girl fancies herself being adored by crowds of knights and courtiers, or thinks of herself as gorgeously attired and in positions of great wealth and influence, and so on. Now Ivy makes a speciality of taking these day-dreams and vivifying them, making them ten times more real to the delighted dreamers, but at the same time moulding and directing them. She gradually turns the dreams from selfishness to unselfishness, guides the children to image themselves as helpers and benefactors, and influences them to think not of what they can receive but of what good they can do, and so by degrees entirely changes their characters. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," and this is true of children also; so that one who understands the enormous power of thought will not be surprised to hear that quite incalculable good has been done in this way, by taking the young at the most impressive age.

Nor has she neglected more ordinary lines of work. For example, a young girl in whom I am deeply interested had recently to undergo a long and wearisome convalescence after a serious illness, and I asked Ivy to take her in charge. I believe my young friend had not a dreary hour during all those weeks, for Ivy kept up a steady stream of thoughts of the most delightful and absorbing nature—stories of all sorts, scenes from different parts of the world with explanatory comments, visions of creatures, astral as well as physical, music of superhuman sweetness—more ingenious devices than I can remember, to help to pass the time pleasantly and instructively.

But all this general description of her work is only an introduction to the particular story which I am about to tell, a story which, I think, my readers will understand all the better for having some acquaintance with the character of the principal actor in it. It is a case about which she was very eager—in fact, for the moment it was her principal interest, and she was very triumphant at having carried it to a successful issue.

I will tell the tale briefly, and will try to put it into chronological order. It came to me all upside down, beginning with an acute crisis which is really in the middle of the story; and the earlier part (which accounts for all the rest) I did not learn until some time after. It seems that long ago Ivy had a birth in Rome—also as a girl—and on that occasion she had a school-friend whom we will call Rosa. The two little girls were very devoted to one another, and grew up as almost inseparable companions. Rosa was strikingly handsome, and was scarcely more than fifteen when the inevitable young man came into the story. Through trusting him too far she had to run away from home, fearing to face disclosures. Ivy, though much shocked and pained, loyally stood by her friend, hid her for some time, and helped her to escape from the city. It seems, however, that Rosa was not to escape the consequences of her misplaced confidence, for she fell into bad hands and died early under rather miserable conditions.

Rosa and the young man who was involved seem to have had a birth together (without Ivy) somewhere in the Middle Ages, in which they did practically exactly the same thing over again—just repeated the previous drama.

In this present life Rosa was born rather later, I think, than Ivy, but in a different part of the world. She was, unfortunately for herself, an illegitimate child, and her mother died soon after her birth. I do not know whether this was the karma of her own proceedings along similar lines in previous births, but it appears rather probable. The mother's story had been a sad one, and, and the aunt who brought up poor Rosa never forgave her for being, as she put it, the cause of the death of a dearly-loved sister. In addition, the aunt was a stern old puritan of the worst type, so we may imagine that Rosa had a miserable childhood.

Into her life, about a year before the time of which I am writing, came that very same young man—a wandering artist or angler or something of that sort this time—and they diligently played out their play along the same old lines. The man seemed a nice enough young fellow, though weak—by no means the sort of designing ruffian that one might expect. I think this time he would have married her, though he could not in the least afford it; but, however that may have been, he had not the opportunity, for he was promptly killed in an accident, and left her in the usual condition. She did not know what to do; of course she could not face such an aunt with such a story, and eventually she made up her mind to drown herself. She wandered out one day for that purpose, having left a letter for her aunt announcing her intention; and she sat down on the bank of the river, moodily looking at the water.

Up to this point, it will be understood, Ivy had known nothing whatever of all that I have related, but at this crisis she arrived on the scene (astrally of course) apparently by the merest chance; but I do not believe that there is any such thing as chance in these matters. Of course she did not recognize Rosa as a friend of two thousand years ago, but she saw her terrible despair, and felt strongly attracted towards her and full of pity for her. Now it happens that a few weeks before, in connection with quite another business, I had shown Ivy how to mesmerize, and explained to her under what circumstances the power could legitimately be employed. So she put those instructions into practice here, and made Rosa fall asleep upon the bank of the river.

As soon as she had drawn her out of her body, she presented herself to her as a friend, showed the deepest affection and sympathy for her, and at last succeeded in arguing her out of her intention of suicide. Neither of them knew exactly what to do next, so Ivy, taking Rosa with her, rushed off to find Cyril. But as it was broad daylight he was quite on the physical plane and busily engaged, and so not available at the moment for astral communications. This being so, Ivy brought her capture over here to me, and hurriedly related the circumstances.

I suggested that for the present at least Rosa must go home again, but nothing would induce her to do that, so great was her horror of her aunt's cold cruelty. The only other alternative was the very risky one of going out vaguely into the world—since I made her renew her vow not to go out of it by suicide. Since we could not permit that, she seemed willing to face the difficulties of beginning a new life, saying that it could not possibly be so miserable as the old one, even though it led her to starvation. Ivy approved and enthusiastically promised to help her, though it did not seem quite clear to me at the moment what she could do.

It was eventually decided thus, because there seemed no alternative, so Rosa was sent back into her body on the river bank, and fortunately when she woke she remembered enough of what she called her dream to recoil with horror from the water, and start off to walk to a neighbouring town. Of course she had scarcely any money—people never have on these occasions—but she was able to find a cheap lodging for that night and to buy a little food, and during her sleep Ivy cheered, encouraged and comforted her in the intervals of prosecuting a vigorous and determined search for somebody who could be influenced to help on the physical plane. By this time Cyril was asleep and she had secured his co-operation; and fortunately between them they were successful in discovering a delightfully benevolent old lady who lived alone with one servant in a pretty little villa in a village some miles away, and by unremitting effort they made the two people (Rosa and the old lady) dream of one another, so that there should be a strong mutual interest and attraction between them when they met on the physical plane.

Next morning Ivy directed Rosa's steps toward the village where the old lady lived, and though it was a long and weary walk for her it was at last achieved. But towards the end of it extreme physical fatigue laid her open to depressing influences, and she began to be vividly conscious that she had now only a few pence left, that she did not know in the least where to go or what to do, and that, after all, the hope and cheer that had buoyed her up during the long day were based only upon what seemed to her a dream. At last in sheer exhaustion she sat down upon a bank by the roadside looking the picture of misery, and it was there that the old lady found her, and at once knew her as the girl whom she had loved so deeply in her dream. Their mutual recognition was indeed a strange and wonderful experience, and they were both profoundly surprised and moved, yet in a certain way very happy about it.

The old lady led the girl forthwith to her pretty little home, and soon drew from her the whole story of her trouble, which aroused in her the keenest sympathy. She at once offered shelter and help at least until after the birth of the expected child, and it is by no means improbable that she may decide to adopt Rosa. At least, Ivy is working in that direction, and has strong hopes of success; and when she makes up her mind about anything she generally carries it through.

CHAPTER XIV

TYPICAL ORDINARY CASES

A SAD case in which it was not possible to do much directly was that of three little children belonging to a drunken mother. She received some trifling pension on account of them, and therefore could not at first be induced to part with them, though she neglected them shamefully and seemed to feel but little affection for them. The eldest of them was only ten years of age, and the conditions surrounding them, mentally, astrally and etherically, were as bad as they could be. The mother seemed for the time quite beyond the reach of any higher influence, though many efforts had been made to appeal to her better nature. The only thing that could be done was to leave one of my young assistants by the bedside of the children to ward off patiently from them the horrible thought-forms and the coarse living entities which clustered so thickly round the degraded mother. Eventually I showed the neophyte how to make a strong shell round the children, and to set artificial elementals to guard them as far as might be.

A difficulty here is that nature-spirits will not work under such horrible conditions, and though they can be forced to do so by certain magical ceremonies, this plan is not adopted by those who work under the Great White Lodge. We accept only willing co-operation, and we cannot expect entities at the level of development of such nature-spirits as would be used in a case of this kind to have already acquired such a spirit of self-sacrifice as would cause them voluntarily to work amidst surroundings so terrible to them. Mere thought-forms can be made and left to work under any conditions, but the intelligent living co-operation of a nature-spirit to ensoul such thought-forms can be had only when the nature-spirit is reasonably at ease in his work.

Later on, however, we made better progress with this case. Determined efforts were made upon the physical plane as well as upon the astral, and I am happy to say that they were eventually crowned with at least temporary success. The two elder children have been sent to a children's Home, and though the mother still retains the youngest with her, she has been persuaded to put herself under the care of some religious friends, and is at present a reformed character.

There are in astral work many cases in which continuous action is necessary—that is to say, in which someone who is willing to take the trouble must, as it were, stand over the person who requires assistance, and be constantly ready to give it. Naturally those who are in charge of a vast assortment of varied astral work cannot with justice devote themselves to this extent to any single case, so that usually some relation of the sufferer is put in charge, if one can be found who is sufficiently capable and trustworthy.

A man recently dead, whom I had been asked (by a relation of his) to help, was found to be in a state of terrible depression, surrounded by a vast cloud of gloomy thought, in the midst of which he felt himself utterly helpless and impotent. His life had been far from spotless, and there were those whom he had injured who thought of him often with malice and revenge in their hearts. Such thought-forms acted upon him through the clouds of depression, fastened themselves upon him like leeches and sucked out from him all vitality and hope and buoyancy, leaving him a prey to the most abject despair.

I spoke to him as hopefully as I could, and pointed out to him that, though it was quite true that his life had not been all that it should have been, and that there was in a certain way much justification for the way in which others were regarding him, it was nevertheless both wrong and useless to give way to despair. I explained to him that he was doing serious harm to a surviving relation by his depression, since these thoughts of his, quite without his own volition, constantly reacted upon her and made her life one of utter misery. I told him that while the past could not be undone, at least its effects might be minimized by the endeavour to hold a calm front in the presence of the dislike which he had brought upon himself by his actions, and that he should endeavour to respond to it by kindly wishes, instead of by alternating gusts of hatred and despair. In fact the main text of my sermon was that he must forget himself and his sorrows, and think only of the effect of his attitude upon his surviving relation.

The poor fellow responded to this, though only in a half-hearted way; he said that he would really try, and he certainly meant it, but I could see that he had little hope of success, or perhaps I should rather say that he had no hope at all, but felt quite certain beforehand that he was foredoomed to failure. I told him plainly all this; I broke up the rings of depression which shut him in, and dissipated the dark clouds which surrounded him, so that the unkindly thought-forms of those whom he had injured should have less upon which they could fasten. For the moment he seemed almost cheerful, as I held before him a strong thought-image of the surviving relation, whom he had deeply loved, and he said:

"While you are here I seem to understand, and I almost think that I can resist the despair; but I know that, as you say, my courage will fade as soon as you are gone."

So I told him that this must not be so—that, hopeless as he felt now, every determined effort to conquer the despair would make it easier to do so next time, and that he must regard this resistance as a duty in which he could not allow himself to fail. I had to go about my business, but I asked one of my young assistants to stay by this man for a while, to watch the accumulation of the depressing thoughts, and to break them up determinedly every time that they took hold of the victim. I knew that if this were done with sufficient persistence we should eventually reach a condition in which the man could resist for himself, and maintain his own position, although from long-continued submission he had at first scarcely any strength to sustain the struggle. My young friend kept up this battle for some two or three hours, until the dark thoughts came much less frequently and the man himself was becoming able to a large extent to hold his own, so the helper felt himself justified in returning to me.

He was just about to take his departure, leaving a few last strong encouraging thoughts for the now almost cheerful sufferer, when he saw a little girl (in her astral body) flying in headlong terror before some kind of hobgoblin of the conventional ogre type. He promptly put himself in the way, saying: "What is this?" and the frightened child clung to him convulsively and pointed to the pursuing demon. The helper has since admitted that he did not at all like the look of it himself, but he seems to have felt somewhat indignant on behalf of the girl, and his instructions were that to anything whatever of this nature a bold front must always be shown. So he stood his ground and set his will against the ogre, which did not approach them, but remained at a little distance writhing about, gnashing its huge projecting teeth, and evidently trying to make itself look as terrible as possible.

As the situation showed no signs of changing, the neophyte presently became impatient, but he had been warned against aggressive action of any kind except under very definite instructions, so he did not know precisely what to do. He therefore came in search of me, bringing the terrified child with him, but moving very slowly and circumspectly, and always keeping his face towards the unpleasant-looking object which followed them persistently at a little distance.

When I had time to attend to him, I investigated the question, and found that this poor little child was frequently subject to these horrible nightmares, from which her physical body would wake up in quite a convulsive condition, sometimes with terrible shrieks. The pursuing entity was nothing but an unpleasant thought-form temporarily animated by a mischievous nature-spirit of a low type, who seemed to be in great glee and to derive a kind of spiteful pleasure from the terrors of the girl. I explained all this to the children, and the indignant boy promptly denounced the nature-spirit as wicked and malicious, but I pointed out to him that it was no more so than a cat playing with a mouse, and that entities at such a low stage of evolution were simply following their undeveloped natures, and therefore could not rightly be described as wicked.

At the same time their foolish mischief could not be allowed to cause suffering and terror to human beings, so I showed him how to set his will against the nature-spirit, and drive it out from the form, and then how to dissipate the form by a definite effort of his will. The little girl was half-fearful, but wholly delighted when she saw her ogre explode, and there is reason to hope that she will gain courage from this experience, and that for the future her sleep will be less disturbed. There are so many varieties of unpleasant thought-forms to be found on the astral plane, the worst of all being those connected with false and foolish religious beliefs—demons of various kinds, and angry deities. It is quite allowable for the occultist to destroy such creatures, since they are in no way really alive, that is to say, they represent no permanent evolving life, but are simply temporary creations.

A case of some interest which has just come under our notice is that of a brother and sister, who had been very closely attached to one another in youth. Unfortunately, later, a designing woman came between them; the brother came under her influence and was taught by her to suspect his sister's motives. The sister quite reasonably distrusted the other woman and warned the brother against her; the warning was not taken in good part, and a serious breach ensued. The infatuation of the brother lasted for more than a year, and all this time the sister held entirely aloof, for she had been grossly insulted and was proud and unforgiving. By degrees the brother discovered the true character of the woman, though for long he would not believe it, and clung to his delusions. Even when it was impossible longer to maintain his blind faith, he still remained somewhat sore with regard to his sister, persuading himself somehow that but for her interference, as he called it, the other woman might have remained faithful to him, so that the estrangement still persisted, even though the reasons for it had largely passed out of the brother's life.

In this case the best thing to do seemed to be to set two assistants to work, one with the brother and one with the sister, to call up persistently before their minds pictures of the old days when they loved each other so dearly. Presently, after these currents had been thoroughly set going, I taught the assistants how to make thought-forms which would continue this treatment. The brother and sister had of course no idea that they were being treated; it just seemed to each of them that thoughts of the other were persistently arising—that all sorts of unexpected little happenings reminded them of happier times. For a long time pride held out, but at last the brother responded to the constant suggestion, went to call on his sister, and found her unexpectedly gracious, forgiving, and glad to see him. Reconciliation was instantly effected, and it is little likely now that they will allow any cloud to come between them again.

CHAPTER XV

WRECKS AND CATASTROPHES

SOMETIMES it is possible for members of the band of helpers to avert impending catastrophes of a somewhat larger order. In more than one case when the captain of a vessel has been carried unsuspecting far out of his course by some unknown current or through some mistaken reckoning, and has thereby run into serious danger, it has been possible to prevent shipwreck by repeatedly impressing upon his mind a feeling that something was wrong; and although this generally comes through into the captain's brain merely as a vaguely warning intuition, yet if it occurs again and again he is almost certain to give it some attention and take such precautions as suggest themselves to him.

In one case, for example, in which the master of a barque was much nearer in to the land than he supposed, he was again and again pressed to heave the lead, and though he resisted this suggestion for some time as being unnecessary and absurd, he at last gave the order in a somewhat hesitating way.

The result astounded him, and he at once put his vessel about and stood off from the coast, though it was not until morning came that he realized how close he had been to an appalling disaster.

Often, however, a catastrophe is karmic in its nature, and consequently cannot be averted; but it must not therefore be supposed that in such cases no help can be given. It may be that the people concerned are destined to die, and therefore cannot be saved from death; but in many cases they may still be to some extent prepared for it, and may certainly be helped upon the other side after it is over. Indeed, it may be definitely stated that whenever a great catastrophe of any kind takes place, there is also a special sending of help.

Two recent cases in which such help was given were the sinking of the "Drummond Castle" off Cape Ushant, and the terrible cyclone which devastated the city of St. Louis in America. On both these occasions a few minutes' notice was given, and the helpers did their best to calm and raise men's minds, so that when the shock came upon them it was less disturbing than it might otherwise have been. Naturally, however, the greater part of the work done with the victims in both these calamities was done upon the astral plane after they had left their physical bodies; but of this we shall speak later.

It is sad to relate how often when some catastrophe is impending the helpers are hindered in their kindly offices by wild panic among those whom the danger threatens—or sometimes, worse still, by a mad outburst of drunkenness among those whom they are trying to assist. Many a ship has gone to her doom with almost every soul on board mad with drink, and therefore utterly incapable of profiting by any assistance offered either before death or for a long time afterwards.

If it should ever happen to any of us to find ourselves in a position of imminent danger which we can do nothing to avert, we should try to remember that help is certainly near us, and that it rests entirely with ourselves to make the helper's work easy or difficult. If we face the danger calmly and bravely, recognizing that the true ego can in no way be affected by it, our minds will then be open to receive the guidance which the helpers are trying to give, and this cannot but be best for us, whether its object be to save us from death or, when that is impossible, to conduct us safely through it.

Assistance of this latter kind has not infrequently been given in cases of accidents to individuals, as well as of more general catastrophes. It will be sufficient to mention one example as an illustration of what is meant. In one of the great storms which did so much damage around our coasts a few years ago, it happened that a fishing boat was capsized far out at sea. The only people on board were an old fisherman and a boy, and the former contrived to cling for a few minutes to the overturned boat. There was no physical help at hand, and even if there had been, in such a raging storm it would have been impossible to do anything, so that the fisherman knew well enough that there was no hope of escape, and that death could only be a question of a few moments. He felt great terror at the prospect, being especially impressed by the awful loneliness of that vast waste of waters; and he was also much troubled with thoughts of his wife and family, and the difficulties in which they would be left by his sudden decease.

Our President, who happened to be passing, seeing all this, endeavoured to comfort him, but finding his mind too much disturbed to be impressionable, she thought it advisable to show herself to him in order to assist him the better. In relating the story afterwards she said that the change which came over the fisherman's face at sight of her was wonderful and beautiful to see; with the shining form standing upon the boat above him he could not but think that an Angel had been sent to comfort him in his trouble, and therefore he felt that not only would he himself be carried safely through the gates of death, but that provision would assuredly be made for his family also. So, when death came to him a few moments later, he was in a frame of mind very different from the terror and perplexity which had previously over-come him; and naturally when he recovered consciousness upon the astral plane and found the "Angel" still beside him, he felt himself at home with her, and was prepared to accept her advice as regards the new life upon which he had entered.

Some time later she was engaged in another piece of work of similar character, the story of which she has since told as follows:

"You remember that steamer that went down in the cyclone at the end of last November; I betook myself to the cabin where about a dozen women had been shut in, and found them wailing in the most pitiful manner, sobbing and moaning with fear. The ship had to founder—no aid was possible—and to go out of the world in this state of frantic terror is the worst possible way to enter the next. So in order to calm them I materialized myself, and of course they thought I was an Angel, poor souls; they all fell on their knees and prayed me to save them, and one poor mother pushed her baby into my arms, imploring me to save that at least. They soon grew quiet and composed as we talked, and the wee baby went to sleep smiling, and presently they all fell asleep peacefully, and I filled their minds with thoughts of the heaven-world, so that they did not wake when the ship made her final plunge downwards. I went down with them to ensure their sleeping through the last moments, and they never stirred as their sleep became death."

Evidently in this case, too, those who were thus helped had not only the enormous advantage of being enabled to meet death calmly and reasonably, but also the still greater aid of being received on its farther shore by one whom they were already disposed to love and trust—one who thoroughly understood the new world in which they found themselves, and could not only reassure them as to their safety, but advise them how to order their lives under these much-altered circumstances. And this brings us to the consideration of one of the largest and most important departments of the work of invisible helpers—the guidance and assistance which they are able to give to the dead.

CHAPTER XVI

WORK AMONG THE DEAD

It is one of the many evils resulting from absurdly erroneous teaching as to conditions after death which is unfortunately current in the western world, that those who have recently shaken off this mortal coil are usually much puzzled and often seriously frightened at finding everything so different from what their religion had led them to expect. The mental attitude of a large number of such people was pithily voiced the other day by an English general, who three days after his death was one of the band of helpers whom he had known in physical life. After expressing his great relief that he had at last found someone with whom he was able to communicate, his first remark was: "But I am dead, where am I? For if this is heaven, I don't think much of it; and if it is hell, it is better than I expected."

But unfortunately a far greater number of people are things less philosophically. They have been taught that all men are destined to eternal flames except a favoured few who are superhumanly good; and since a very small amount of self-examination convinces them that they do not belong to that category, they are but too often in a condition of panic terror, dreading every moment that the new world in which they find themselves may dissolve and drop them into the clutches of the devil, in whom they have been sedulously taught to believe. In many cases they spend long periods of acute mental suffering before they can free themselves from the fatal influence of this blasphemous doctrine of everlasting punishment—before they can realize that the world is governed, not according to the caprice of a hideous demon who gloats over human anguish, but according to a benevolent and wonderfully patient law of evolution, which is absolutely just indeed, but yet again and again offers to man opportunities of progress, if he will but take them, at every stage of his career.

It ought in fairness to be mentioned that it is only among what are called protestant communities that this terrible evil assumes its most aggravated form. The great Roman Catholic Church, with its doctrine of purgatory, approaches much more nearly to a conception of the astral plane, and its devout members at any rate realize that the state in which they find themselves shortly after death is merely temporary, and that it is their business to endeavour to raise themselves out of it as soon as may be by intense spiritual aspiration, while they accept any suffering which may come to them as necessary for the wearing away of the imperfections in their character before they can pass to higher and brighter regions.

It will thus be seen that there is plenty of work for the helpers to do among the newly dead, for in the vast majority of cases they need to be calmed and reassured, to be comforted and instructed. In the astral, just as in the physical world, there are many who are but little disposed to take advice from those who know better than they; yet the very strangeness of the conditions surrounding them renders many of the dead willing to accept the guidance of those to whom these conditions are obviously familiar; and many a man's stay on that plane has been considerably shortened by the earnest efforts of this band of energetic workers.

Not, be it understood, that the karma of the dead man can in any way be altered; he has built for himself during life an astral body of a certain degree of density, and until that body is sufficiently dissolved, he cannot pass on into the heaven-world beyond; but he need not lengthen the period necessary for that process by adopting an improper attitude.

All students ought clearly to grasp the truth that the length of a man's astral life after he has put off his physical body depends mainly upon two factors—the nature of his past physical life, and his attitude of mind after what we call death. During his earth-life he is constantly influencing the building of matter into his astral body. He affects it directly by the passions, emotions and desires which he allows to hold sway over him; he affects it indirectly from above by the action upon it of his thoughts, and from below by the details of his physical life—his continence or his debauchery, his cleanliness or his uncleanness, his food and his drink.

If by persistence in perversity along any of these lines he is so stupid as to build for himself a coarse and gross astral vehicle, habituated to responding only to the lower vibrations of the plane, he will find himself after death bound to that plane during a long and slow process of that astral body's disintegration. On the other hand if by decent and careful living he gives himself a vehicle mainly composed of finer material, he will have very much less post-mortem trouble and discomfort, and his evolution will proceed much more rapidly and easily.

This much is generally understood, but the second great factor—his attitude of mind after death—seems often to be forgotten. The desirable thing is for him to realize his position on this particular little arc of his evolution—to learn that he is at this stage withdrawing steadily inward towards the plane of the true ego, and that consequently it is his business to disengage his thoughts as far as may be from things physical, and to fix his attention more and more upon those spiritual matters which will occupy him during his life in the heaven-world. By doing this he will greatly facilitate the natural astral disintegration, and will avoid the sadly common mistake of unnecessarily delaying himself upon the lower levels of what should be so temporary a residence.

But many of the dead considerably retard the process of dissolution by clinging passionately to the earth which they have left; they simply will not turn their thoughts and desires upward, but spend their time in struggling with all their might to keep in full touch with the physical plane, thus causing great trouble to anyone who may be trying to help them. Only in earthly matters have they ever had any living interest, and they cling to them with desperate tenacity even after death. Naturally as time passes on they find it increasingly difficult to keep hold of things down here, but instead of welcoming and encouraging this process of gradual refinement and spiritualization they resist it vigorously by every means in their power.

Of course the mighty force of evolution is eventually too strong for them, and they are swept on in its beneficent current, yet they fight every step of the way, thereby not only causing themselves a vast amount of entirely unnecessary pain and sorrow, but also seriously delaying their upward progress and prolonging their stay in astral regions to an almost indefinite extent. In convincing them that this ignorant and disastrous opposition to the cosmic will is contrary to the laws of nature, and persuading them to adopt an attitude of mind which is the exact reversal of it, lies a great part of the work of those who are trying to help.

Very much more than this can be done by the helpers for those who have studied these subjects, and have learnt during life to control the lower nature. As was stated in the manual on The Astral Plane, and in my book on The Other Side of Death, the matter of the astral body is always rearranged in concentric shells immediately after death by the action of the desire-elemental; and it is this which limits the consciousness for the time to the lowest subplane. But the dead man is in no way bound to submit himself without resistance to this rearrangement; just as during earth-life he can conquer the wild surgings of desire by a determined effort of the will, so after death also he is master of his own vehicle, if he will only exert his power.

He may decline altogether to allow the rearrangement to continue, and by an effort of his will he may restore to his astral body its original flexibility. He may insist upon retaining it in exactly the same condition as during his earth-life, although to do this will probably mean a protracted struggle with the elemental, precisely analogous to the struggle which takes place when a man sets himself to conquer some strong desire in physical life. But it is very well worth his while to make this effort, for when he has succeeded he will find himself free to move as he will in the astral world; conscious not of one subplane only, but of all the subplanes simultaneously, just as is the case with a man who enters astral life in full consciousness while still alive. In this way not only can his astral life be considerably shortened, but it can also be made much happier and more useful while it lasts. The man who thus sets himself free is at once in a position to give much help to others. He may in fact, if sufficiently well-instructed, join the band of helpers and undertake regular work with them, thus being of great use to his fellows in astral life, and incidentally storing up much good karma for himself.

Another reason for resisting the concentric arrangement is that it often prevents or delays the reunion of friends. The astral body has not separate sense-organs, as the physical body has. The figure of denser matter in the middle of its ovoid reproduces exactly the form of the physical body in every particular; but though it has the appearance of eyes, it does not see with them; it has the semblance of ears, but it does not hear by their means. It sees and hears (or, more accurately, it receives the vibrations which produce for it the equivalent of what in the physical world we call seeing and hearing) not through special organs, but through any of its particles which happen at any given moment to be on its surface.

It contains within it matter belonging to each of the subplanes of the astral, but each of these types of matter can receive only the vibrations appropriate to it. During life all its particles are constantly in rapid motion and circulation, exactly like those of boiling water, so particles of every subplane are always entering and leaving the surface film, and therefore the man within can at any time see the scenery and the inhabitants of any subplane. If he meets a friend on the astral plane at night, he sees the whole astral body of that friend—sees him exactly as he is.

But if the desire-elemental is allowed to rearrange the matter of the man's astral body in concentric sheaths at death, only the coarse particles of the lowest subplane are on its surface; and the effect of that is that the man can see nothing but matter of that type. The unpleasant surroundings of that subplane will be the only scenery visible to him; if he meets a friend, he cannot see that friend as he is, but only so much of him as can be expressed through the coarse matter—that is to say, only his least desirable side—his sensuality, his meanness, his jealousy, his irritability, if he has any of these evil qualities. But if the friend has been dead for some time, he will probably have rid himself of these characteristics, and lost the coarse matter through which they were expressed; and in that case his newly-arrived friend (whose body has been rearranged) will not be able to see him at all!

When an invisible helper comes along, breaks up the concentric shells and restores the circulation, the newly-arrived man will be able to see the whole plane and to enjoy the society of the friend who has been longer in the astral world. So on all accounts the proceedings of the elemental should be discouraged.

It happens occasionally that the dead are earth-bound by anxiety—anxiety sometimes about duties unperformed or debts undischarged, but more often on account of wife or children left without adequate provision. In such cases as this it has more than once been necessary, before the dead man was satisfied to pursue his upward path in peace, that the helper should to some extent act as his representative upon the physical plane, and attend on his behalf to the settlement of the business which was troubling him. An illustration taken from our recent experience will perhaps make this clearer.

One of the band of pupils was trying to assist a poor man who had died in one of our western cities, but found it impossible to withdraw his mind from earthly things because of his anxiety about two young children whom his death had left without means of support. He had been a working man of some sort, and had been unable to lay by any money for them; his wife had died some two years previously, and his landlady, though exceedingly kind-hearted and willing to do anything in her power for them, was herself far too poor to be able to adopt them, and very reluctantly came to the conclusion that she would be obliged to hand them over to the parish authorities. This was a great grief to the dead father, though he could not blame the landlady, and was himself unable to suggest any other course.

Our friend asked him whether he had no relative to whom he could entrust them, but the father knew of none. He had a younger brother, he said, who would certainly have done something for him in this extremity, but he had lost sight of him for fifteen years, and did not even know whether he was living or dead. When he last heard of him, he had been apprenticed to a carpenter in the north, and he was then described as a steady young fellow who, if he lived, would surely get on.

The clues at hand were certainly slight, but since there seemed no other prospect of help for the children, our friend thought it worth while to make a special effort to follow them up. Taking the dead man with him he commenced a patient search after the brother in the town indicated; and after a great deal of trouble they were actually successful in finding him. He was now a master carpenter in a fairly flourishing way of business—married, but without children though earnestly desiring them, and therefore apparently just the man for the emergency.

The question now was how the information could best be conveyed to this brother. Fortunately he was found to be so far impressionable that the circumstances of his brother's death and the destitution of his children could be put vividly before him in a dream, and this was repeated three times, the place and even the name of the landlady being clearly indicated to him. He was immensely impressed by this recurring vision, and discussed it earnestly with his wife, who advised him to write to the address given. This he did not like to do, but was strongly inclined to travel down into the west country, find out whether there was such a house as that which he had seen, and if so make some excuse to call there. He was a busy man, however, and he finally decided that he could not afford to lose a day's work for what after all might well prove to be nothing but the baseless fabric of a dream.

The attempt along these lines having apparently failed, it was determined to try another method, so one of the helpers wrote a letter to the man detailing the circumstances of his brother's death and the position of the children, exactly as he had seen them in his dream. On receipt of this confirmation he no longer hesitated, but set off the very next day for the town indicated, and was received with open arms by the kind-hearted landlady. It had been easy enough for the helpers to persuade her, good soul that she was, to keep the children with her for a few days on the chance that something or other would turn up for them, and she has ever since congratulated herself that she did so. The carpenter of course took the children back with him and provided them with a happy home, and the dead father, now no longer anxious, passed rejoicing on his upward way.

Since some Theosophical writers have felt it their duty to insist in vigorous terms upon the evils so frequently attendant upon the holding of spiritualistic séances, it is only fair to admit that on several occasions good work similar to that of the helper in the case just described has been done through the agency of a medium or of someone present at a circle. Thus, though spiritualism has sometimes detained souls who but for it would have attained speedier liberation, it must be set to the credit of its account that it has also furnished the means of escape to others, and thus opened up the path of advancement for them. There have been instances in which the defunct has been able to appear unassisted to his relatives or friends and explain his wishes to them; but these are naturally rare, and most souls who are earth-bound by anxieties of the kind indicated can satisfy themselves only by means of the services of the medium or the conscious helper.

Another case frequently encountered on the astral plane is that of the man who cannot believe that he is dead at all. Indeed, most people consider the very fact that they are still conscious to be an absolute proof that they have not passed through the portals of death; somewhat of a satire this, if one thinks of it, on the practical value of our much-vaunted belief in the immortality of the soul! However they may have labelled themselves during life, the great majority of those who die, in this country at any rate, show themselves by their subsequent attitude to have been to all intents and purposes materialists at heart; and those who on earth have honestly called themselves so are often no more difficult to deal with than others who would have been shocked at the very name.

A recent instance was that of a scientific man who, finding himself fully conscious, and yet under conditions differing radically from any that he had ever experienced before, had persuaded himself that he was still alive, and merely the victim of a prolonged and unpleasant dream. Fortunately for him there happened to be among the band of those able to function upon the astral plane a son of an old friend of his, a young man whose father had commissioned him to search for the departed scientist and endeavour to render him some assistance. When after some trouble the youth found and accosted him, he frankly admitted that he was in a condition of great bewilderment and discomfort, but still clung desperately to his dream hypothesis as on the whole the most probable explanation of what he saw, and even went so far as to suggest that his visitor was nothing but a dream-figure himself!

At last, however, he so far gave way as to propose a kind of test, and said to the young man: "If you are, as you assert, a living person, and the son of my old friend, bring me from him some message that shall prove to me your objective reality." Now although under all ordinary conditions of the physical plane the giving of any kind of phenomenal proof is strictly forbidden to the pupils of the Masters, it seemed as though a case of this kind hardly came under the rules; and therefore, when it had been ascertained that there was no objection on the part of higher authorities, an application was made to the father, who at once sent a message referring to a series of events which had occurred before the son's birth. This convinced the dead man of the real existence of his young friend, and therefore of the plane upon which they were both functioning; and as soon as he felt this established, his scientific training at once reasserted itself, and he became exceedingly eager to acquire all possible information about this new region.

Of course the message which he so readily accepted as evidence was in reality no proof at all, since the facts to which it referred might have been read from his own mind or from the records of the past by any creature possessed of astral senses. But his ignorance of these possibilities enabled this definite impression to be made upon him, and the Theosophical instruction which his young friend is now nightly giving to him will undoubtedly have a stupendous effect upon his future, for it cannot but greatly modify not only the heaven-state which lies immediately before him, but also his next incarnation upon earth.

The main work, then, done for the newly dead by our helpers is that of soothing and comforting them; of delivering them when possible from the terrible though unreasoning fear which often seizes them, and not only causes them much unnecessary suffering, but retards their progress to higher spheres; and of enabling them as far as may be to comprehend the future that lies before them.

Taking my own work as an example, I have quite a large connection, a large number of dead people whom I visit each night; and new cases are constantly turning up. It is one of the peculiarities of work with the dead that they are often very nervous, much like children in the dark. As long as you will sit by the bedside of a child and hold his hand, he feels safe and happy; but when you leave him the darkness closes round him, and he becomes timid again; so you sit beside him and hold his hand till he falls asleep. Similarly with many of the dead. Some worthy old dead person is very timorous, and does not know when the floor is going to open and drop her into hell; she is reassured as long as I stand beside her, but as soon as I go away, the fear begins to reassert itself, and she wonders whether I was not a devil in disguise. So I do with her as we do with little children; I leave somebody with her. A neophyte in astral work may not know what to do with an unusual and difficult case, but he can sit beside the old lady and comfort her, and tell her much about this new life. He has only to be there, and to be obviously at ease and unafraid; that is what reassures the dead. If the helper showed nervousness, the dead person would at once be afraid too.

A considerable number of novices travel about each night with each of the older helpers. Suppose we come across a case of some woman in great sorrow. I say to her:

“What is the matter? What can we do for you? I am sorry for you, but I assure you that you will feel much better, now that you have told me all about it.”

Then, turning to one of the learners, I say: “O Miss So-and-So, would you mind sitting with this lady for a time?”

Presently we meet with another case, and drop another of our tyros, until all the attendants are at work; but by that time usually some of them return, having completed their task. So in time they learn to be able to do such work on their own account; they can do it just as soon as they have confidence in themselves, and then they can set up in business as full-fledged helpers.

Other dead people who have been longer on the astral plane may also receive much help, if they will but accept it, from explanations and advice as to their course through its different stages. They may, for example, be warned of the danger and delay caused by attempting to communicate with the living through a medium, and sometimes (though rarely) an entity already drawn into a spiritualistic circle may be guided into higher and healthier life. Teaching thus given to persons on this plane is by no means lost, for though the memory of it cannot usually be directly carried over to the next incarnation, there always remains the real inner knowledge, and therefore the strong predisposition to accept it immediately when heard again in the new life.

A rather remarkable instance of service rendered to the dead was the first achievement of a recent recruit to the band of helpers—one who is hardly as yet a full-fledged member. This young aspirant had not long before lost an aged relation, for whom he had felt an especially warm affection; and his earliest request was to be taken by a more experienced friend to visit her in the hope that he might be of some service to her. This was done, and the effect of the meeting of the living and the dead was beautiful and touching. The older person's astral life was already approaching its end, but a condition of apathy, dulness and uncertainty prevented her from making any immediate progress.

But when the boy, who had been so much to her in earth-life, stood once more before her and dissolved by the sunlight of his love the grey mist of depression which had gathered around her, she was aroused from her stupor; and soon she understood that he had come in order to explain to her her situation, and to tell her of the glories of the higher life toward which her thoughts and aspirations ought now to be directed. But when this was fully realized, there was such an awakening of dormant feeling in her and such an outrush of devoted affection towards her earnest young helper, that the last fetters which bound her to the astral life were broken, and that one great outburst of love and gratitude swept her forthwith into the higher consciousness of the heaven-world. Truly there is no greater and more beneficent power in the universe than that of pure, unselfish love.

CHAPTER XVII

WORK IN CONNECTION WITH THE WAR

MANY have asked what, if anything, it was found possible for the band of invisible helpers to do in connection with the war. Its members worked nobly during that awful time, and I think I may say that they were of incalculable use and assistance. At that period and for that purpose our band was largely augmented. Even in ordinary days there are numbers of helpers outside the Theosophical circle, and during the war thousands of people offered themselves who had probably never thought of the possibility of such work before.

The conditions introduced by the war were in various ways unusual. It was not only that thousands of men were suddenly thrown out into the astral world, but that all these men were young and strong and nearly all of them belonged to the most advanced races of the world. A man who dies in old age has already exhausted most of his emotional forces; those which are still playing through him are comparatively weak and easily controlled, and are not likely to give him much trouble. But the man who dies in the full flush of youth and strength has his emotions all at their highest point; therefore he is capable of suffering through them just as on the other hand he is capable of more enjoyment through them. Therefore his astral life usually presents a different set of problems for solution.

What is the condition of these people who die so suddenly? Some of them are for quite a long time after death practically unconscious of the surrounding world. That is one of the consequences of that rearrangement of the matter of the astral body to which I referred in a previous chapter. All the coarsest and grossest astral matter is put outside on the periphery of the astral ovoid; and the result is that only impressions such as can work through that grosser type of matter—vibrations to which it will respond—can either reach the man or be expressed by him.

The man who has been living an ordinarily decent physical life has not been in the habit of using that grosser matter. All the higher emotions—love, devotion, sympathy, patriotism—use the finer particles of the astral body; only the lower emotions, such as sensuality, anger, envy, hatred, use the grosser part of it. A man does not suddenly change his nature when he dies, and begin to use vibrations to which he is not accustomed; and as he can be conscious only through the outer film of his astral body, the consequence is that he remains shut up inside that shell of dense matter, living in a sort of rosy dream, happily unconscious of all the unpleasantness around him, until those grosser particles gradually wear away, and he wakes up at a higher level. But that may not be for weeks, or sometimes even months.

Others experience nothing but a momentary unconsciousness at death—just a sharp shock, and then they feel far better and lighter than they ever felt before. It is not only the weight of the physical body of which they are relieved; it is far more the pressure of the atmosphere fifteen pounds to the square inch—perhaps about two tons on the whole body. We are so accustomed to this that we bear it all the time without knowing that it is there; but when we are set free from it, we realize that we have lost something incredibly heavy and depressing.

Often such a man does not know that he is dead, and will not believe it. He will perhaps try to pick up his rifle; he cannot grasp it. He will try to speak to a living comrade; he does not hear him; he will try to touch some physical friend; there is no result. He will say to a helper: "You say I am dead; I feel much more alive than I did ten minutes ago." Sometimes he wants to go on fighting; then it is necessary to calm him and explain things to him. When at last such a soldier realized his position, he was generally immensely interested, for he found that he had all sorts of new opportunities. He could go unseen into the enemy's lines, and he was often very anxious to communicate his observations, though it was only very rarely that he could succeed in doing so. Still, there were a few cases in which he did manage to make an impression on somebody's mind; but even then, the recipient usually thought that it was only imagination, and took no heed.

Some men were chiefly anxious about their families; others were desirous to learn all they could of the new conditions in which they found themselves. The business of the invisible helper is to be ready to meet all these different requirements. The principal demand made upon him is for teaching of some sort; it usually amounts to giving them Theosophical information—not that we wish to impose our belief upon them, but because it represents the facts of the case and it is for those that they ask. When matters were explained to them, many of the dead soldiers were ready and eager to do whatever they could for their comrades, whether the latter were already on the astral or still on the physical plane, and their activities were varied and most useful.

I cannot here enter upon so vast a field as the description of these multifarious enterprises; but I will give a few samples of the work done in connection with the war by some of the juvenile members of the band of helpers whose exploits we have been narrating in previous chapters. The original Cyril of last century, who figured in the stories of the hotel fire and the two brothers, was an officer in the British army, was twice badly wounded, and suffered the terrible fate of capture and imprisonment in Germany, from which he was eventually released by exchange. A young helper of a later generation, who was an enthusiastic admirer of his, showed his appreciation by adopting the same pseudonym; and it is of some of his achievements that I shall now write.

THE STORY OF URSULA

In the course of our work as invisible helpers on the battlefield we encountered a certain Captain, who had recently passed over into the astral world, to whom we will give the name of Harold. He readily absorbed such explanations about the new life in which he found himself as we were able to give, and soon became quite reconciled and happy, except for one matter that preyed greatly upon his mind. He was his father's eldest son, and had one brother a year or two younger than himself. The two brothers had grown up together in the closest affection, and even the fact that presently they both fell in love with the same young lady made no difference to their relations. Harold had become engaged to this girl Ursula before the war; his brother Julian loved her also, but resolutely strove to conquer the feeling, out of loyalty to Harold.

Both brothers enlisted as soon as the war broke out, but Julian had the misfortune to be severely wounded and incapacitated for further military service after only a short experience of the rigours of the battlefield. Thus it came about that he remained at home, and was thrown constantly into association with Ursula, whom he loved more deeply than ever. She soon became aware of his feeling, and presently, to her great consternation, found herself reciprocating it. No word of love passed between these two young people, and both of them were ashamed of their passion, feeling it a treachery to the absent warrior, who of course had no suspicion of it. So as time went on Julian and Ursula grew more and more unhappy at home, and even Harold on his brief visits on leave somehow felt that something was wrong, though he did not know what.

It was while matters were in this eminently unsatisfactory condition that Harold was killed.

—killed in the very act of leading his men on to victory. He took his death quite philosophically, his only regret being for the poignant sorrow which he knew both Julian and Ursula would feel. In his efforts to mitigate this he hovered about them almost continuously, and with the keener insight of the astral world he soon detected the existence of a strong affection between them. He at once saw in this a hope of speedy relief and consolation for both of them, and earnestly tried to foster it; but the strong preconception existing in their own minds led them entirely to misunderstand his well-meant attempts to influence them.

His frequent astral visits kept him constantly in their thoughts; but the more insistently his image obtruded itself in their minds, the more bitterly ashamed they felt of what they regarded as disloyalty to his memory, and the more firmly they resolved to resist temptation. Indeed, Ursula had taken a mental vow of life-long devotion to single blessedness for his sake. Meanwhile, Harold himself was much worried over the inexplicable disinclination of those whom he loved to accept the solution of their difficulties which he so eagerly desired.

The young helper Cyril,¹ to whom this case was entrusted, soon found that until this family affair was settled it would be impossible for his patient to give his whole attention to astral work, so he accompanied Harold to his ancestral home, to see whether anything could be done to clear up the situation. They came upon Julian and Ursula walking together down a woodland path—glad to be together, and yet all the time feeling guilty and uncomfortable. The boy Cyril tried his hardest to impress them with the truth, but could not overcome their wrong-headed convictions; they felt the insistent suggestion that Harold would approve, but regarded it merely as an illusion born of illicit desire. The young helper in despair called upon his older and more experienced friend, but his efforts also were unavailing; and at last the boy said:

“We shall never do it unless we can talk to them face to face; if you will materialize me, I think I can convince them.”

The elder agreed, and a few minutes later an eager and excited little boy rushed up to the disconsolate couple, crying:

“I bring you a message from Harold; he wants you two to marry and be happy, and he sends you his love and his blessing.”

The stupefaction of the unconfessed lovers may be imagined; they were too astonished to resent this sudden intrusion of a stranger child into the region of their most sacred emotions; but after a few moments Ursula contrived to gasp out:

"Who are you? What do you mean when you say you come from Harold? Don't you know that Harold is dead?"

The boy replied: "I'm Cyril; but never mind about me; there is no time for all that; try to understand what I tell you, and do what Harold wishes."

Then hurriedly (for he knew that force must not be wasted in holding together a materialization longer than is necessary) he explained that there is no such thing as death, and that Harold stood there beside them at that moment, as fully himself as he had ever been, conscious of the love they had so carefully concealed, thoroughly approving of it, and anxious only for their perfect happiness.

"Ursula!" cried Julian, "on my soul I believe this is true; I feel it, I know it!"

"O, if I could only believe it!" replied Ursula, startled out of all her jealously guarded reserve. "But how can I be sure? You say Harold is here,"—turning sharply to the boy—"show him to me for a moment, let him tell me himself, and then I will believe."

"May we?" said the boy to his elder. The latter bowed his head, and the shadowy form of Harold stood there, smiling upon them with starry eyes; he took a step forward, clasped Ursula's hand and laid it gently in that of the awe-stricken Julian. Then he raised his hand, as a priest does in blessing, and a sudden thought seemed to strike him; he felt inside his tunic, and drew forth a tiny golden crucifix, which he held out to Ursula, but before she could take it he had faded away.

The boy turned to the elder helper: "Could we get that for her?" he asked. The elder went aside for a few moments, and when he returned he laid the physical crucifix in Cyril's hand. The boy at once gave it to Ursula, saying:

"See, here is the crucifix which Harold wished you to have."

The lovers still stood with clasped hands, uttering disjointed exclamations of wonder and awe; and as Ursula took the crucifix she said:

"At least this proves that it is not all a dream, for I gave this to Harold before he went to the war see, here are the initials I had engraved upon it."

Julian, suddenly recollecting himself, seized Cyril by the hand. "We have not thanked you yet," he said; "I don't know who you are, and I don't in the least understand all this; but you have done us a service that nothing can ever repay, and if there is anything I can do to show my gratitude—"

Here Ursula rushed forward and bent down impulsively, apparently trying to kiss the child;

but the horrified boy dematerialized with lightning rapidity, and her arms closed on empty air. There is no doubt that she was both startled and disappointed; but Julian found means to console her, and they probably spent many an hour in discussing the marvellous experience which had come to them. Julian deeply regretted that he had no opportunity of showing his appreciation of what the boy had done for them; and he emphatically expressed a desire that, if God should ever bless them with offspring, their first-born son should receive the name of Cyril, in memory of this day; and to this Ursula blushing but whole-heartedly agreed.

Not unnaturally this event aroused in Ursula a keen interest in the conditions of life after death, and in non-physical phenomena generally. Cyril, hovering about her the next day, thought he saw an opportunity for good work here; so as she walked in the wood, alone except for a huge dog, he obtained permission to show himself to her again for a few minutes, in order to suggest to her the names of a few Theosophical books by his favourite authors, which she has since procured. She was overjoyed to see him again, though he was careful to keep at a safe distance this time; and it was interesting to notice that the big dog, though startled and curious at first, distinctly approved of him, and showed marked friendship in a dignified way.

THE OFFICER'S WILL

Another case of some interest was reported by the same young helper a few days later. A dead officer was found to be much troubled about the disposal of his property. The story which he told was this. He had an estate, which was entailed, and also a certain amount of money of which he could dispose by will. His mother had for some time been pressing him to marry a young lady of means for whom he felt no special affection, and he had welcomed the necessity of enlistment as an excuse for postponing a decision which he was loath to make.

He had been severely wounded, and during a long convalescence had fallen in love with a French lady who has acting as nurse. He married her according to French law, but did not inform his mother in England of what he had done, fearing her anger at the frustration of her plans, and knowing also that she had a pronounced dislike for foreigners. He thought that he could explain matters better when he was able to take his wife home after the war; and he was not without hope that in the meantime a son might be born to him, and that such an event would soften his mother's ire.

Now all his plans had been upset by his death. It seems that he was endeavouring to save the life of a wounded private, when both of them were again wounded much more severely—indeed fatally. They managed to creep into a shell-hole, and the tide of war swept on, leaving them aside. The dying officer made a most determined effort to write his last will and testament, but was in great doubt whether the document would be found, whether if it were found it would fall into the right hands, and whether even then it would be considered legal. Fortunately he had a fountain-pen with him, but no paper except the last letter which he had received from his wife. That had a blank page at the back, and on that he began to write as well as he could, recognizing that he had but very little time.

He contrived, though in great pain and failing fast, to express clearly and definitely his wish that all his property should pass to his wife, whose address he gave; and he also added a request that whoever found this document should send it to his London lawyer. Having signed it, he begged the dying private at his side to attach his signature as witness; the man tried to do so, but the pen fell from his hand when he had written only two or three letters of his name, and in a few minutes both officer and private passed away.

We endeavoured to set his mind at rest by telling him that those who buried the body would be sure to find the paper lying beside it, and to take care of it. But he had many doubts; first, he declared that the place where he fell was a remote corner, which might not be visited, as the tide of battle had rapidly receded from it; secondly, he feared that rain might obliterate the writing, which was already blood-stained; thirdly, even if it were found while still legible, it might easily be included among his other effects, and sent home to his mother instead of his lawyer. His great hope was that the child whom his wife was already expecting might prove to be a son, and his anxiety was that that son's claim on the entailed estate might be proved. He thought that under the circumstances a holograph will, though unwitnessed, would probably be accepted.

It transpired that he had an old school-friend near at hand, and it seemed to us that on the whole the most hopeful line of effort would be to try to influence that friend in some way. He proved determined, however, as friends so often do; and in this case after many fruitless attempts at thought-transference, we had to resort to the materialization of a young helper. Various difficulties arose, but were surmounted one by one, and at last the friend was guided to the officer's body, and the will duly discovered and forwarded to the lawyer. The donor's mind is at rest, therefore, and there seems no doubt that his wishes will be carried out as far as possible.

SOME MINOR CASES

Our junior helpers were sometimes able to make themselves useful more directly upon the physical plane. For example, when some peasants were fleeing wildly before German soldiers who were rushing into their cottages and setting them on fire, our young people guided four of the fugitives to a small cave by the side of a river, where they hid until the Germans had finished their ruffianly work and passed on. Then they returned to their village and contrived to extinguish the flames in one of the houses. They all slept there that night, and next day they made their way to a neighbouring village which had escaped the depredations of the marauders.

A few days later Cyril saved two more lives—a boy's and a girl's. They were the only survivors of a village, for the Germans had killed all the other children. They had somehow succeeded in hiding, and when the soldiers left the burnt village they tried to get away without being seen. They managed to escape from among the houses, but the quick manœuvres of the armies cut them off, and when Cyril found them they were again hiding, this time in a cup-like depression in the ground in the midst of a thicket through which cannon-balls and bullets were incessantly pouring. The slight depression saved them from the shots, but the Germans were in the little wood, and the children were in danger of being caught and killed by them. For a long time the battle raged over their heads as they lay in the mud, and finally the Germans were driven out of the wood. Apparently the Allies did not occupy it, and the fighting went on round them all through the day and night, so that they dared not move. The cold and the wet were dreadful, and when Cyril found them they had had no food for two days, and the boy had taken off nearly all his clothes to cover his little sister. He was almost dying, and the little girl was not much better off, though at least warm.

Cyril materialized, but they did not understand him, and were rather afraid, because they could not imagine who he could be or how he came to be there. So he called his older friend, who translated, and satisfied them that we meant them no harm. Cyril first poured warmth and strength into the boy, and when he declared he felt quite hot our young helper found some bread and sausage for him in the haversack of a dead soldier close by. Even in that extremity the boy made his sister eat first, but fortunately other dead soldiers had provisions, so there was enough for both. Then when they were stronger Cyril led them away. They had had no idea which way was least dangerous, but of course Cyril by rising into the air could see the whole battlefield and calculated the chances. He encouraged them and helped them along, and at last brought them to the back of the firing-line, and to a group of French soldiers who gave them some food and passed them on to a field hospital, where a nurse took them in hand, covered them with a cloak and told them to sleep. They were then perfectly safe, and some of the good people looked after them, as all their relations had been killed.

In another case there was a long bridge across a river, and a little girl had the idea that by crossing it she would be able to procure some bread for her mother and some little ones who were starving. There were soldiers all about, and it was distinctly a dangerous expedition, but she waited for what she considered a favourable opportunity, and then started to run across. But she was only in the middle of the long passage when a great rabble of defeated soldiers came tearing down upon the bridge and dashed madly across it, the pursuing enemy throwing shells among them as they ran. The mass of men came blundering on, fighting so wildly for room to fly that they trampled one another down, and some were even thrown over the sides of the bridge. The little girl had no way of escape, and was paralyzed with horror—very weak too with starvation. Instantly Cyril materialized himself and helped her over the side of the bridge, and made her squeeze herself in between two of the stanchions underneath and cling there. She remained there in safety, though quaking with terror, till the fugitives and the pursuers had passed over, and then she climbed back again and resumed her errand of mercy.

Presently Cyril discovered a new line of usefulness—that of saving vessels from mines by trying to influence the mind of the steersman. Of course he, in his astral body, could distinguish a mine without difficulty, and he was successful in inducing several men to avoid such traps. I think at first he tried to tell the helmsman that there was a mine in his way, but apparently it was not easy to put the idea into his head. Then it struck Cyril to make him steer a point off his true course for a few minutes—just enough to enable him to clear the obstruction. Then he allowed the man to wake up, as it were, and he was startled to find himself going wrong, as he thought, and immediately altered his helm, hoping that no one had observed his slip, which he attributed to his having fallen asleep for a few moments. In one case an officer noticed the slight change of course and abused the helmsman, who at once changed back in great confusion, but fortunately he had already passed out of danger.

Cyril's success in this was peculiar, for it is not easy to mislead an experienced quartermaster as to his course. In one case he could not make the helmsman alter his course, so as there was serious danger Cyril materialized a hand and pulled the wheel round himself. The man saw the hand, dropped the wheel with a shout of terror, and fled from the bridge. There were a few minutes of confusion, during which Cyril steered the ship away from the mine, and by the time the officer dashed up and took control they were out of danger. They decided that the sailor had been drinking or dreaming, and he was a good deal ridiculed, but he manfully maintained that a small white hand had seized the wheel, and he had distinctly felt the wheel move under its pressure. It will make a good ghost-story, for sailors are ready to believe anything supernatural.

Another case was that of little Ethan, whose father was killed in the early days of the war. His mother had died when he was quite tiny, so his father and he had been much alone together, and had become the closest of friends. Ethan almost worshipped the tall strong man, who was always so gentle and quiet with him, though he could speak sternly enough to others when occasion arose. The little boy could always understand what his father taught him, and the pair often discussed many subjects which are not usually studied by boys eight years of age. There was a curiously strong sympathy between them, and each often knew without words what the other was thinking. When the father went to the war, he left Ethan in the care of his eldest cousin, a loud-voiced jolly sort of man with a large and noisy family.

These people were all exceedingly kind to Ethan according to their light, but not unnaturally they did not understand him in the least. When his father was killed they were profoundly shocked, and full of eager though clumsy commiseration. Ethan was not at all the neglected orphan of fiction; his relations did what they could to console him and make much of him, and took a good deal of trouble to see that all his father's property was absolutely secured to him. He was quite conscious of their kind intention, and grateful for it; but that did not alter the fact that he missed his father every moment of his waking life, and that nothing whatever that these others could do in the least made up for his absence. He was visibly pining away—dying apparently of a broken heart, and they were at their wits' end to know what to do.

All this time his father hovered round him, full of anxiety for him. Every night, as soon as Ethan left his body, they were together just as of old, and the boy was deliriously happy; but when he woke in the morning he had no clear recollection of what had happened, though always there was a feeling that there had been something wonderful and beautiful. So each morning he had a moment or two of happiness, and then slowly woke to a dull sense of emptiness and misery.

It was in trying to help the father that Cyril's attention was first drawn to this strange little by-way of tragedy; but as soon as he saw it his sympathy for little Ethan was intense, and he determined to make every possible effort to rescue him from the fatal melancholy which was sapping his vitality. Obviously what was needed was to make him remember in physical life his experience when away from the body; but all attempts in this direction were fruitless, for he had no idea of anything of the sort, and so his mind was closed to its possibility.

In astral life Cyril won shy Ethan's confidence, and they became great friends; but all Cyril's instructions to the smaller boy to try to bridge the chasm seemed quite in vain. At last Cyril in despair resorted to his panacea of materialization; he came through into physical life with Ethan one morning as he woke, so that the latter found him standing in a dense body by his bedside. As Ethan's eyes opened, Cyril said:

"Now you know me perfectly, don't you? You remember how I stood holding your hand a moment ago, while your father held the other?"

"Yes, yes!" cried Ethan excitedly; "but where is father now?"

"He is still holding your hand, but you cannot see him now your eyes are open. I can make you see me for a few moments; I cannot make you see him, but I can make you feel his hand."

"I do feel it," said Ethan; "I should know his hand from all the rest in the world."

When a connection was once clearly established in this way, Ethan was able to remember all that his father had told him; and the next morning Cyril could make him bring through the recollection without needing to materialize more than just the grip of the two hands—the father's big one on one side, and his own small one on the other. So now Ethan remembers more and more each morning, and Cyril is rapidly teaching Theosophy to both father and son. Ethan is gloriously happy, and is rapidly regaining colour and strength in his physical body; but his relations do not understand his recovery any more than they understood his sickness, and he will never be able to explain!

CHAPTER XVIII

OTHER BRANCHES OF THE WORK

BUT turning back again now from the all-important work among the dead to the consideration of the work among the living, we must briefly indicate a great branch of it, without a notice of which our account of the labours of our invisible helpers would indeed be incomplete, and that is the immense amount which is done by suggestion—by simply putting good thoughts into the minds of those who are ready to receive them.

Let there be no mistake as to what is meant here. It would be perfectly easy—easy to a degree which would be quite incredible to those who do not understand the subject practically—for a helper to dominate the mind of any average man, and make him think just as he pleased, and that without arousing the faintest suspicion of any outside influence in the mind of the subject. But, however admirable the result might be, such a proceeding would be inadmissible. All that may be done is to throw the good thought into the person's mind as one among the hundreds of thoughts that are constantly sweeping through it; whether the man takes it up, makes it his own, and acts upon it, depends upon himself entirely. Were it otherwise, it is obvious that all the good karma of the action would accrue to the helper only, for the subject would have been a mere tool, and not an actor—which is not what is desired.

The assistance given in this way is exceedingly varied in character. The consolation of those who are suffering or in sorrow at once suggests itself, as does also the endeavour to guide towards the truth those who are earnestly seeking it. When a person is spending much anxious thought upon some spiritual or metaphysical problem, it is often possible to put the solution into his mind without his being at all aware that it comes from external agency.

A pupil too may often be employed as an agent in what can hardly be described otherwise than as the answering of prayer; for though it is true that any earnest spiritual desire, such as might be supposed to find its expression in prayer, is itself a force which automatically brings about certain results, it is also a fact that such a spiritual effort offers an opportunity of influence to the Powers of Good, of which they are not slow to take advantage; and it is sometimes the privilege of a willing helper to be made the channel through which their energy is poured forth. What is said of prayers is true to an even greater extent of meditation, for those to whom this higher exercise is a possibility.

Besides these more general methods of help there are also special lines open only to the few. Again and again such pupils as are fitted for the work have been employed to suggest true and beautiful thoughts to authors, poets, artists and musicians; but obviously it is not every helper who is capable of being used in this way.

Sometimes, though more rarely, it is possible to warn persons of the danger to their moral development of some course which they are pursuing, to clear away evil influences from about some person or place, or to counteract the machinations of black magicians. It is not often that direct instruction in the great truths of nature can be given to people outside the circle of occult students, but occasionally it is possible to do something in that way by putting before the minds of preachers and teachers a wider range of thought or a more liberal view of some question than they would otherwise have taken.

There is another application of this method of mental suggestion which is of the highest importance, though from its very nature it is open only to the more advanced members of the band of helpers. Just in the same way as ordinary people may be aided in their personal troubles, and may receive counsel and guidance in matters which directly affect only a small number of those who are closely associated with them, so may suggestions be respectfully offered to those who have much power and responsibility in the political or religious worlds—to Kings and their ministers, to the heads of great departments of the Church or the State, to leaders of thought whose words may influence thousands; suggestions which, if accepted and translated into action, may benefit whole nations and materially affect the progress of the world.

Be it ever remembered that behind all the seeming chaos of greed and selfishness there is an ordered evolution, a mighty Hierarchy of great Adepts who constitute the true inner Government of the world, and at their head the resplendent figure of the One Initiator, the spiritual King who represents upon this planet the Logos of the Solar System. Under His all-wise direction slowly, slowly through the ages the resistless tide of evolution sweeps steadily on, though the individual waves that form it rise and fall, rush on and recede, yet ever return with greater and greater strength until His divine purpose shall be fulfilled, and the earth shall be filled with the glory of God as the waters cover the sea.

It is under the guidance of that Hierarchy that our band of helpers carries on its work, and so it comes about that as a student of occultism progresses on the Path he attains a wider sphere of usefulness. Instead of assisting individuals only, he learns how classes, nations and races are dealt with, and he is entrusted with a gradually increasing share of the higher and more important work done by the Adepts themselves. As he acquires the requisite power and knowledge he begins to wield the greater forces of the mental and the astral planes, and is shown how to make the utmost possible use of each favourable cyclic influence. He is brought into relation with those great Nirmânakâyas who are sometimes symbolized as the Stones of the Guardian Wall, and he becomes—at first of course in the humblest capacity—one of the band of their almoners, and learns how those forces are dispersed which are the fruit of their sublime self-sacrifice. Thus he rises gradually higher and higher until, blossoming at length into Adeptship, he is able to take his full share of the responsibility which lies upon the Masters of Wisdom, and to help others along the road which he has trodden.

On the mental plane the work differs somewhat, since teaching can be both given and received in a much more direct, rapid and perfect manner, while the influences set in motion are infinitely more powerful, because acting on so much higher a level. But (though it is useless to speak of it in detail at present, since so few of us are yet able to function consciously upon this plane during life) here also—and even higher still—there is always plenty of work to be done, as soon as we can make ourselves capable of doing it; and there is certainly no fear that for countless aeons we shall ever find ourselves without a career of unselfish usefulness open before us.

CHAPTER XIX

THE QUALIFICATIONS REQUIRED

How, it may be asked, are we to make ourselves capable of sharing in this great work? Well, there is no mystery as to the qualifications which are needed by one who aspires to be a helper; the difficulty is not in learning what they are, but in developing them in oneself. To some extent they have been already incidentally described, but it is nevertheless as well that they should be set out fully and categorically.

1. Single-mindedness. The first requisite is that we shall have recognized the great work which the Masters would have us do, and that it shall be for us the one great interest of our lives. We must learn to distinguish not only between useful and useless work, but between the different kinds of useful work, so that we may each devote ourselves to the highest of which we are capable, and not fritter away our time in labouring at something which, however good it may be for the man who cannot yet do anything better, is unworthy of the knowledge and capacity which should be ours as Theosophists. A man who wishes to be considered eligible for employment on higher planes must begin by doing the utmost that lies in his power in the way of definite work for Theosophy down here.

Of course I do not for a moment mean that we are to neglect the ordinary duties of life. We should certainly do well to undertake no new worldly duties of any sort, but those which we have already bound upon our shoulders have become a karmic obligation which we have no right to neglect. Unless we have done to the full the duties which karma has laid upon us we are not free for the higher work. But this higher work must nevertheless be to us the one thing for which it is really worth living—the constant background of a life which is consecrated to the service of the Masters of Compassion.

2. Perfect self-control. Before we can be safely trusted with the wider powers of the astral life, we must have ourselves perfectly in hand. Our temper, for example, must be thoroughly under control, so that nothing that we may see or hear can cause real irritation in us, for the consequences of such irritation would be far more serious on that plane than on this. The force of thought is always an enormous power, but down here it is reduced and deadened by the heavy physical brain-particles which it has to set in motion. In the astral world it is far freer and more potent, and for a man with fully-awakened faculty to feel anger against a person there would be to do him serious and perhaps even fatal injury.

Not only do we need control of temper, but control of nerve, so that none of the fantastic or terrible sights that we may encounter may be able to shake our dauntless courage. It must be remembered that the pupil who awakens a man upon the astral plane incurs thereby a certain amount of responsibility for his actions and for his safety, so that unless his neophyte had courage to stand alone the whole of the older worker's time would be wasted in hovering round to protect him, which it would be manifestly unreasonable to expect.

It is to make sure of this control of nerve, and to fit them for the work that has to be done, that candidates are always made, now as in days of old, to pass what are called the tests of earth, water, air and fire.

In other words, they have to learn with that absolute certainty that comes not by theory, but by practical experience, that in their astral bodies none of these elements can by any possibility be hurtful to them—that none can oppose any obstacle in the way of the work which they have to do.

In this physical body we are fully convinced that fire will burn us, that water will drown us, that the solid rock forms an impassable barrier to our progress, that we cannot with safety launch ourselves unsupported into the ambient air. So deeply is this conviction ingrained in us that it costs most men a good deal of effort to overcome the instinctive action which follows from it, and to realize that in the astral body the densest rock offers no impediment to their freedom of motion, that they may leap with impunity from the highest cliff, and plunge with the most absolute confidence into the heart of the raging volcano or the deepest abysses of the fathomless ocean.

Yet until a man knows this—knows it sufficiently to act upon his knowledge instinctively and confidently—he is comparatively useless for astral work, since in emergencies that are constantly arising he would be perpetually paralyzed by imaginary disabilities. So he has to go through his tests, and through many another strange experience—to meet face to face with calm courage the most terrifying apparitions amid the most loathsome surroundings—to show in fact that his nerve may be thoroughly trusted under any and all of the varied groups of circumstances in which he may at any moment find himself.

Further, we need control of mind and of desire; of mind, because without the power of concentration it would be impossible to do good work amid all the distracting currents of the astral plane; of desire, because in that strange world to desire is very often to have, and unless this part of our nature were well controlled we might perchance find ourselves face to face with creations of our own of which we should be heartily ashamed.

3. Calmness. This is another most important point—the absence of all worry and depression. Much of the work consists in soothing those who are disturbed, and cheering those who are in sorrow; and how can a helper do that work if his own aura is vibrating with constant fuss and worry, or grey with the deadly gloom that comes from perpetual depression? Nothing is more hopelessly fatal to occult progress or usefulness than our twentieth-century habit of ceaselessly worrying over trifles—of eternally making mountains out of molehills. Many of us simply spend our lives in magnifying the most absurd trivialities—in solemnly and elaborately going to work to make ourselves miserable about nothing.

Surely we who are Theosophists ought, at any rate, to have grown beyond this stage of irrational worry and causeless depression; surely we, who are trying to acquire some definite knowledge of the cosmic order, ought by this time to have realized that the optimistic view of everything is always nearest to the divine view, and therefore to the truth, because only that in any person which is good love of God which, like the peace of God, passeth man's understanding.

These are the qualities toward the possession of which the helper must ceaselessly strive, and of which some considerable measure at least must be his before he can hope that the Great Ones who stand behind will deem him fit for full awakening. The ideal is in truth a high one, yet none need therefore turn away disheartened, or think that while he is still but struggling toward it he must necessarily remain entirely useless on the astral plane, for short of the responsibilities and dangers of that full awakening there is much that may safely and usefully be done.

There is hardly one among us who would not be capable of performing at least one definite act of mercy and goodwill each night while we are away from our bodies. Our condition when asleep is usually one of absorption in thought, be it remembered—a carrying on of the thoughts that have principally occupied us during the day, and especially of the last thought in the mind when sinking into sleep. Now if we make that last thought a strong intention to go and give help to someone whom we know to be in need of it, the soul when freed from the body will undoubtedly carry out that intention, and the help will be given. There are several cases on record in which when this attempt has been made, the person selected has been fully conscious of the effort of the would-be helper, and has even seen his astral body in the act of carrying out the instructions impressed upon it.

Indeed, no one need sadden himself with the thought that he can have no part nor lot in this glorious work. Such a feeling would be entirely untrue, for every one who can think can help. Nor need such useful action be confined to our hours of sleep. If you know (and who does not?) of someone who is in sorrow or suffering, though you may not be able consciously to stand in astral form by his bedside, you can nevertheless send him loving thoughts and earnest good wishes; and be well assured that such thoughts and wishes are real and living and strong—that when you so send them they do actually go and work your will in proportion to the strength which you have put into them. Thoughts are things, intensely real things, visible enough to those whose eyes have been opened to see, and by their means the poorest man may bear his part in the good work of the world as fully as the richest. In this way at least, whether we can yet function consciously upon the astral plane or not, we all can join, and we all ought to join, the army of invisible helpers.

But the aspirant who definitely desires to become one of the band of astral helpers who are working under the direction of the great Masters of Wisdom will make his preparation part of a far wider scheme of development. Instead of merely endeavouring to fit himself for this particular branch of their service, he will undertake with high resolution the far greater task of training himself to follow in their footsteps, of bending all the energies of his soul to attain even as They have attained, so that his power of helping the world may not be confined to the astral plane, but may extend to those higher levels which are the true home of the divine self of man.

For him the path has been marked out long ago by the wisdom of those who have trodden it in days of old—a path of self-development which sooner or later all must follow, whether they choose to adopt it of their own free will, or to wait until, after many lives and an infinity of suffering, the slow, resistless force of evolution drive them along it among the laggards of the human family. But the wise man is he who eagerly enters upon it immediately, setting his face resolutely toward the goal of Adeptship, in order that, being safe for ever from all doubt and fear and sorrow himself, he may help others into safety and happiness also. What are the steps of this Path of Holiness, as the Buddhists call it, and in what order they are arranged, let us see in our next chapter.

CHAPTER XX

THE PROBATIONARY PATH

EASTERN books tell us that there are four means by which a man may be brought to the beginning of the path of spiritual advancement. (1) By the companionship of those who have already entered upon it. (2) By the hearing or reading of definite teaching on occult philosophy. (3) By enlightened reflection; that is to say, that by sheer force of hard thinking and close reasoning he may arrive at the truth, or some portion of it, for himself. (4) By the practice of virtue, which means that a long series of virtuous lives, though it does not necessarily involve any increase of intellectuality, does eventually develop in a man sufficient intuition to enable him to grasp the necessity of entering upon the Path, and show him in what direction it lies.

When, by one or another of these means, he has arrived at this point, the way to the highest Adeptship lies straight before him, if he chooses to take it. In writing for students of occultism it is hardly necessary to say that at our present stage of development we cannot expect to learn all, or nearly all, about any but the lowest steps of this Path; whilst of the highest we know little but the names, though we may catch occasional glimpses of the indescribable glory which surrounds them.

According to the esoteric teachings these steps are grouped in three great divisions:

1. The probationary period, before any definite pledges are taken, or initiations (in the full sense of the word) are given. This carries a man to the level necessary to pass successfully through what in Theosophical books is usually called the critical period of the fifth round.

2. The period of pledged discipleship, or the Path proper, whose four stages are often described in Oriental books as the four paths of holiness. At the end of this the pupil obtains Adeptship—the level which humanity should reach at the close of the seventh round

3. What we may venture to call the official period, in which the Adept takes a definite part (under the great Cosmic Law) in the government of the world, and holds a special office connected therewith. Of course every Adept—every pupil even, when once definitely accepted, as we have seen in the earlier chapters—takes a part in the great work of helping forward the evolution of man; but those standing on the higher levels take charge of special departments, and correspond in the cosmic scheme to the ministers of the crown in a well-ordered earthly state.

Before going into details of the probationary period it is well to mention that in most of the Eastern sacred books this stage is regarded as merely preliminary, and scarcely as part of the Path at all, for they consider that the latter is really entered only when definite pledges have been given. Considerable confusion has been created by the fact that the numbering of the stages occasionally commences at this point, though more often at the beginning of the second great division; sometimes the stages themselves are counted, and sometimes the initiations leading into or out of them, so that in studying the books one has to be perpetually on one's guard to avoid misunderstanding.

This probationary period, however, differs considerably in character from the others; the divisions between its stages are less decidedly marked than are those of the higher groups, and the requirements are not so definite or so exacting. But it will be easier to explain this last point after giving a list of the five stages of this period, with their respective qualifications. The first four were very ably described by Mr. Mohini Mohun Chatterji in the first Transaction of the London Lodge, to which readers may be referred for fuller definitions of them than can be given here. Much exceedingly valuable information about them is also given by Dr. Besant in her books The Path of Discipleship and In the Outer Court.

The names given to the stages will differ somewhat, for in those books the Hindu Sanskrit terminology was employed, whereas the Pâli nomenclature used here is that of the Buddhist system; but although the subject is thus approached from a different side, as it were, the qualifications exacted will be found to be precisely the same in effect even when the outward form varies. In the case of each word the mere dictionary meaning will first be given in parentheses, and the explanation of it which is usually given by the teacher will follow. The first stage, then, is called among Buddhists:

1. Manodvâravajjana (the opening of the doors of the mind, or perhaps escaping by the door of the mind)—and in it the candidate acquires a firm intellectual conviction of the impermanence and worthlessness of mere earthly aims. This is often described as learning the difference between the real and the unreal; and to learn it often takes a long time and many hard lessons. Yet it is obvious that it must be the first step toward anything like real progress, for no man can enter whole-heartedly upon the Path until he has definitely decided to "set his affection upon things above, not on things of the earth," and that decision comes from the certainty that nothing on earth has any value as compared with the higher life. This step is called by the Hindus the acquirement of Viveka or discrimination, and Mr. Sinnett speaks of it as the giving allegiance to the higher self.

2. Parikamma (preparation for action)—the stage in which the candidate learns to do the right merely because it is right, without considering his own gain or loss either in this world or the future, and acquires, as the Eastern books put it, perfect indifference to the enjoyment of the fruit of his actions. This indifference is the natural result of the previous step; for when the neophyte has once grasped the unreal and impermanent character of all earthly rewards, he ceases to crave for them; when once the radiance of the real has shone upon the soul, nothing below that can any longer be an object of desire. This higher indifference is called by the Hindus Vairâgya.

3. Upachâro (attention or conduct)—the stage in which what are called "the six qualifications" (the Shatsampatti of the Hindus) must be acquired. These are called in Pâli:

(a) Samo (quietude)—that purity and calmness of thought which comes from perfect control of the mind—a qualification exceedingly difficult of attainment, and yet most necessary, for unless the mind moves only in obedience to the guidance of the will it cannot be a perfect instrument for the Master's work in the future. This qualification is a very comprehensive one, and includes within itself both the self-control and the calmness which were described in chapter xix as necessary for astral work.

(b) Damo (subjugation)—a similar mastery over, and therefore purity in, one's actions and words—a quality which again follows necessarily from its predecessor.

(c) Uparati (cessation)—explained as cessation from bigotry or from belief in the necessity of any act or ceremony prescribed by a particular religion—so leading the aspirant to independence of thought and to a wide and generous tolerance.

(d) Titikkhâ (endurance or forbearance)—by which is meant the readiness to bear with cheerfulness whatever one's karma may bring upon one, and to part with anything and everything worldly whenever it may be necessary. It also includes the idea of complete absence of resentment for wrong, the man knowing that those who do him wrong are but the instruments of his own karma.

(e) Samâdhâna (intentness)—one-pointedness, involving the incapability of being turned aside from one's path by temptation. This corresponds very closely with the single-mindedness mentioned in the previous chapter.

(f) Saddhâ (faith)—confidence in one's Master and oneself: confidence, that is, that the Master is a competent teacher, and that, however diffident the pupil may feel as to his own powers, he has yet within him that divine spark which when fanned into a flame will one day enable him to achieve even as his Master has done.

4. Anuloma (direct order or succession, signifying that its attainment follows as a natural consequence from the other three)—the stage in which is acquired that intense desire for liberation from earthly life, and for union with the highest, which is called by the Hindus Mumukshatva.

5. Gotrabhû (the condition of fitness for initiation); in this stage the candidate gathers up, as it were, his previous acquisitions, and strengthens them to the degree necessary for the next great step, which will set his feet upon the Path proper as an accepted pupil. The attainment of this level is followed very rapidly by initiation into the next grade. In answer to the question: "Who is the Gotrabhû?" the Lord Buddha says: "The man who is in possession of those conditions upon which the commencement of sanctification immediately ensues—he is the Gotrabhû."

The wisdom necessary for the reception of the Path of Holiness is called Gotrabhû-gñâna.

Now that we have hastily glanced at the steps of the probationary period, we must emphasize the point to which reference was made at the commencement—that the perfect attainment of these accomplishments and qualifications is not expected at this early stage. As Mr. Mohini says: “If all these are equally strong, Adeptship is attained in the same incarnation.” But such a result is of course extremely rare. It is in the direction of these acquirements that the candidate must ceaselessly strive, but it would be an error to suppose that no one has been admitted to the next step without possessing all of them in the fullest possible degree. Nor do they necessarily follow one another in the same definite order as the later steps; in fact, in many cases a man would be developing the various qualifications all at the same time—rather side by side than in regular succession.

It is obvious that a man might easily be working along a great part of this Path even though he was quite unaware of its very existence, and no doubt many a good Christian, many an earnest freethinker is already far on the road that will eventually lead him to initiation, though he may never have heard the word occultism in his life. I mention these two classes especially, because in every other religion occult development is recognized as a possibility, and would certainly therefore be intentionally sought by those who felt yearnings for something more satisfactory than the exoteric faiths.

We must also note that the steps of this probationary period are not separated by initiations in the full sense of the word, though they will certainly be studded with tests and trials of all sorts and on all planes, and may be relieved by encouraging experiences, and by hints and help whenever these may safely be given. We are apt sometimes to use the word initiation somewhat loosely, as for example when it is applied to such tests as have just been mentioned; properly speaking it refers only to the solemn ceremony at which a pupil is formally admitted to a higher grade by an appointed official, who in the name of the One Initiator receives his plighted vow, and puts into his hands the new key of knowledge which he is to use on the level to which he has now attained. Such an initiation is taken at the entrance to the division which we shall next consider, and also at each passage from any one of its steps to the next.

more than thirty years ago. But much has happened since then; humanity is after all evolving, however slowly, and public opinion has changed considerably with reference to such matters as those of which I treat in this book, so that in later literature we have been permitted to deal with them more fully. If the interest of any reader has been aroused by the rather meagre and technical catalogue of the qualifications given above—if he feels within himself the urge to seek that Path of Holiness and to enter upon it—I would suggest to him the perusal of a more recent book which I have written especially on this subject—The Masters and the Path (issued by The Theosophical Publishing House, Adyar, Madras) in which much additional information may be found.—C.W.L.]

CHAPTER XXI

THE PATH PROPER

IT is in the four stages of this division of the Path that the ten Samyojana, or fetters which bind man to the circle of rebirth and hold him back from Nirvana, must be cast off. And here comes the difference between this period of pledged discipleship and the previous probation. No partial success in getting rid of these fetters is sufficient now; before a candidate can pass on from one of the steps to the next he must be entirely free from certain of these clogs; and when they are enumerated it will be seen how far-reaching this requirement is, and there will be little cause to wonder at the statement made in the sacred books that seven incarnations are sometimes required to pass through this division of the Path.

Each of these four steps or stages is again divided into four; for each has (1) its Maggo, or way, during which the student is striving to cast off the fetters; (2) its Phala (result or fruit) when he finds the results of his action in so doing showing themselves more and more; (3) its Bhavagga or consummation, the period when, the result having culminated, he is able to fulfil satisfactorily the work belonging to the step on which he now firmly stands; and (4) its Gotrabhu, meaning, as before, the time when he arrives at a fit state to receive the next initiation. The first stage is:

I. Sotapati or Sohan. The pupil who has attained this level is spoken of as the Sowani or Sotapanna—"he who has entered the stream"—because from this period, though he may linger, though he may succumb to more refined temptations and turn aside from his course for a time, he can no longer fall back altogether from spirituality and become a mere worldling. He has entered upon the stream of definite higher human evolution, upon which all humanity must enter by the middle of the next round, unless they are to be left behind as temporary failures by the great life-wave, to wait for further progress until the next chain of worlds.

The pupil who is able to take this initiation has therefore already outstripped the majority of humanity to the extent of an entire round of all our seven planets, and in doing so has definitely secured himself against the possibility of falling out of the stream in the fifth round. He is consequently sometimes spoken of as "the saved" or "the safe one."

It is from a misunderstanding of this idea that there arises the curious theory of salvation promulgated by a certain section of the Christian community. The "æonian salvation" of which some of its documents speak is not, as has been blasphemously supposed by the ignorant, from eternal torture, but simply from wasting the rest of this æon or dispensation by falling out of its line of progress. This also is the meaning, naturally, of the celebrated clause in the Athanasian Creed: "Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the catholic faith" (see The Christian Creed, p. 91). The fetters which he must cast off before he can pass into the next stage are:

1. Sakkâyadit̐hi—the delusion of self.
2. Vichikichchhâ—doubt or uncertainty.
3. Sîlabbataparâmâsa—superstition.

The first of these is the "I am I" consciousness, which as connected with the personality, is nothing but an illusion, and must be eliminated at the very first step of the real upward path. But to cast off this fetter completely means even more than this, for it involves the realization of the fact that the individuality also is in very truth one with the All, that it can therefore never have any interests opposed to those of its brethren, and that it is most truly progressing when it most assists the progress

For the very sign and seal of the attainment of the Sotâpatti level is the first entrance of the pupil into the plane next above the mental—that which we usually call the buddhic. It may be—nay, it will be—the merest touch of the lowest subplane of that stupendously exalted condition that the pupil can as yet experience, even with his Master's help; but even that touch is something that can never be forgotten—something that opens a new world before him, and revolutionizes his feelings and conceptions. Then for the first time, by means of the extended consciousness of that plane, he truly realizes the underlying unity of all, not as an intellectual conception merely, but as a definite fact that is patent to his opened eyes; then first he really knows something of the world in which he lives—then first he gets some slight glimpse of what the love and compassion of the great Masters must be.

As to the second fetter, a word of caution is necessary. We who have been trained in European habits of thought are unhappily so familiar with the idea that a blind unreasoning adhesion to certain dogmas may be claimed from a disciple, that on hearing that occultism considers doubt as an obstacle to progress, we are likely to suppose that it also requires the same unquestioning faith from its followers as modern superstitions do. No idea could be more entirely false.

It is true that doubt (or rather uncertainty) on certain questions is a bar to spiritual progress, but the antidote to that doubt is not blind faith (which is itself considered as a fetter, as will presently be seen), but the certainty of conviction founded on individual experiment or mathematical reasoning. While a child doubted the accuracy of the multiplication table he would hardly acquire proficiency in the higher mathematics; but his doubts could be satisfactorily cleared up only by his attaining a comprehension, founded on reasoning or experiment, that the statements contained in the table are true. He believes that twice two is four, not merely because he has been told so, but because it has become to him a self-evident fact. And this is exactly the method, and the only method, of resolving doubt known to occultism.

Vichikichchhâ has been defined as doubt of the doctrines of karma and reincarnation, and of the efficacy of the method of attaining the highest good by this Path of Holiness; and to be free from this Saṃyojana is to arrive at absolute certainty, based either upon personal first-hand knowledge or upon reason, that the occult teaching upon these points is true.

The third fetter to be cast away comprehends all kinds of unreasoning or mistaken belief, all dependence on the efficacy of outward rites and ceremonies to purify the heart. He who would cast it off must learn to depend upon himself alone, not upon others, nor upon the outer husk of any religion.

The first three fetters are in a coherent series. The difference between individuality and personality being fully realized, it is then possible to some extent to appreciate the actual course of reincarnation, and so as to dispel all doubt on that head. This done, the knowledge of the spiritual permanence of the true ego gives rise to reliance on one's own spiritual strength, and so dispels superstition.

II. Sakadâgâmî. The pupil who has entered upon this second stage is spoken of as a Sakridâgâmin—"the man who returns but once"—signifying that a man who has reached this level should need but one more incarnation before attaining arahatship. At this step no additional fetters are cast off, but the pupil is occupied in reducing to a minimum those which still enchain him. It is, however, usually a period of considerable psychic and intellectual advancement.

If what are commonly called psychic faculties have not been previously acquired, they must be developed at this stage, as without them it would be impossible to assimilate the knowledge which must now be given, or to do the higher work for humanity in which the pupil is now privileged to assist. He must have the astral consciousness at his command during his physical waking life, and during sleep the heaven-world will be open before him—for the consciousness of a man when away from his physical body is always one stage higher than it is while he is still burdened with the house of flesh.

III. Anâgâmî. The Anâgâmin (he who does not return) is so called because, having reached this stage, he ought to be able to attain the next one in the life he is then living. He enjoys, while moving through the round of his daily work, all the splendid possibilities of progress given by the full possession of the priceless faculties of the heaven-world, and when he leaves his physical vehicle at night he enters once more into the wonderfully-widened consciousness that belongs to the buddhi. In this step he finally throws aside any lingering remains of the two fetters of

4. Kâmarâga—attachment to the enjoyment of sensation, typified by earthly love, and

5. Patigha—all possibility of anger or hatred.

The student who has cast off these fetters can no longer be swayed by the influence of his senses either in the direction of love or hatred, and is free from either attachment to or impatience of physical plane conditions.

Here again we must guard against a possible misconception—one with which we frequently meet.

The purest and noblest human love never dies away—is never in any way diminished by occult training; on the contrary, it is increased and widened until it embraces all with the same fervour which at first was lavished on one or two. But the student does in time rise above all considerations connected with the mere personality of those around him, and so is free from all the injustice and partiality which earthly love so often brings in its train.

Nor should it for a moment be supposed that in gaining this wide affection for all he loses the especial love for his closer friends. The unusually perfect link between Ânanda and the Lord Buddha, as between St. John and Jesus, is on record to prove that on the contrary this is enormously intensified; and the tie between a Master and his pupils is stronger far than any earthly bond. For the affection which flourishes upon the Path of Holiness is an affection between egos, and not merely between personalities; therefore it is strong and permanent, without fear of diminution or fluctuation, for it is that “perfect love which casteth out fear.”

IV. Arahāt (the venerable, the perfect). On attaining this level the aspirant constantly enjoys the consciousness of the buddhic plane, and is able to use its powers and faculties while still in the physical body; and when he leaves that body in sleep or trance, he passes at once into the unutterable glory of the nirvânic plane. In this stage the occultist must cast off the last remnants of the five remaining fetters, which are:

6. Rûparâga—desire for beauty of form or for physical existence in a form, even including that in the heaven-world.

7. Arûparâga—desire for formless life.

8. Mâno—pride.

9. Uddhachcha—agitation or irritability.

10. Avijjâ—ignorance.

On this we may remark that the casting off of Rûparâga involves putting aside not only all desire for earthly life, however grand or noble that life may be, and for astral or heavenly life, however glorious, but also all liability to be unduly influenced or repelled by the external beauty or ugliness of any person or thing.

Arûparâga—desire for life either in the highest and formless planes of the mental world or in the still more exalted buddhic plane—would be merely a higher and less sensual form of selfishness, and must be cast off just as much as the lower. Uddhachcha really means “liability to be disturbed in mind,” and a man who had finally cast off this fetter would be absolutely unruffled by anything whatever that might happen to him—perfectly impervious to any kind of attack upon his dignified serenity.

To rid oneself of ignorance of course implies the acquisition of perfect knowledge—practical omniscience as regards our planetary chain. When all the fetters are finally cast off, the advancing ego reaches the fifth stage—the stage of full Adeptship—and becomes

V. Asekha, "the one who has no more to learn," again as regards our planetary chain. It is quite impossible for us to realize at our present level what this attainment means. All the splendour of the nirvāṇic plane lies open before the waking eyes of the Adept, while when he chooses to leave his body he has the power to enter upon something higher still—a plane which to us is the merest name. As Professor Rhys Davids explains: "He is now free from all sin; he sees and values all things in this life at their true value; all evil being rooted from his mind, he experiences only righteous desires for himself, and tender pity and regard and exalted love for others."

To show how little he has lost the sentiment of love, we read in the Metta Sutta of the state of mind of one who stands at this level: "As a mother loves, who even at the risk of her own life protects her only son, such love let there be toward all beings. Let goodwill without measure prevail in the whole world, above, below, around, unstinted, unmixed with any feeling of differing or opposing interests. When a man remains steadfastly in this state of mind all the while, whether he be standing or walking, sitting or lying down, then is come to pass the saying which is written: 'Even in this life has holiness been found.' "

CHAPTER XXII

WHAT LIES BEYOND

BEYOND this period it is obvious that we can know nothing of the new qualifications required for the still higher levels which yet lie before the perfect man. It is abundantly clear, however, that when a man has become Asekha, he has exhausted all the possibilities of moral development, so that further advancement for him can only mean still wider knowledge and still more wonderful spiritual powers. We are told that when man has thus attained his spiritual majority, whether in the slow course of evolution or by the shorter path of self-development, he assumes the fullest control of his own destinies, and makes choice of his future line of evolution among seven possible paths which he sees opening before him.

Naturally at our present level we cannot expect to understand much about these, and the faint outline of some of them which is all that can be sketched in for us conveys very little to the mind, except that most of them take the Adept altogether away from our earth-chain, which no longer affords sufficient scope for his evolution.

One path is that of those who, as the technical phrase goes, "accept Nirvâṇa." Through what incalculable æons they remain in that sublime condition, for what work they are preparing themselves, what will be their future line of evolution, are question upon which we know nothing; and indeed if information upon such points could be given it is more than likely that it would prove quite incomprehensible to us at our present stage.

But this much at least we may grasp—that the blessed state of Nirvâṇa is not, as some have ignorantly supposed, a condition of blank nothingness, but on the contrary of far more intense and beneficent activity; and that ever as man rises higher in the scale of nature his possibilities become greater, his work for others ever grander and more far-reaching, and that infinite wisdom and infinite power mean for him only infinite capacity for service, because they are directed by infinite love.

Another class chooses a spiritual evolution not quite so far removed from humanity, for, though not directly connected with the next chain of our system, it extends through two long periods corresponding to its first and second rounds, at the end of which time they also appear to "accept Nirvâna," but at a higher stage than those previously mentioned.

Others join the deva evolution, whose progress lies along a grand chain consisting of seven chains like ours, each of which to them is as one world. This line of evolution is spoken of as the most gradual and therefore the least arduous of the seven courses; but though it is sometimes mentioned in the books as "yielding to the temptation to become a god", it is only in comparison with the sublime height of renunciation of the Nirmânakâya that it can be described in this half-disparaging manner, for the Adept who chooses this course has indeed a glorious career before him, and though the path which he selects is not the shortest, it is nevertheless very noble, as may be seen from the fact that it was chosen by the Lady Mary, the mother of Jesus, when she reached the level of Adeptship and, that she has since been appointed to the very illustrious and responsible office of World-Mother.¹

Yet another group are the Nirmânakâyas—those who, declining all these easier methods, choose the shortest but steepest path to the heights which still lie before them. They form what is poetically termed the "guardian wall," and, as The Voice of the Silence tells us, "protect the world from further and far greater misery and sorrow," not indeed by warding off from it external evil influences, but by devoting all their strength to the work of pouring down upon it a flood of spiritual force and assistance, without which it would assuredly be in far more hopeless case than now.

Yet again there are those who remain even more directly in association with humanity, and continue to incarnate among it, choosing the path which leads through the four stages of what we have called above the official period; and among these are the Masters of Wisdom—those from whom we who study Theosophy have learnt such fragments as we know of the mighty harmony of evolving Nature. But it would seem that only a certain comparatively small number adopt this course—probably only so many as are necessary for the carrying on of this physical side of the work.

In hearing of these different possibilities, people sometimes exclaim rashly that there could of course be no thought in a Master's mind of choosing any but that course which most helps humanity—a remark which greater knowledge would have prevented them from making. We should never forget that there are other evolutions in the solar system besides our own, and no doubt it is necessary for the carrying out of the vast plan of the Lōgos that there should be Adepts working on all the seven lines to which we have referred. Surely the choice of the Master would be to go wherever his work was most needed—to place his services with absolute selflessness at the disposal of the Powers in charge of this part of the great scheme of evolution.

This then is the Path which lies before us, the Path which each one of us should be beginning to tread. Stupendous though its heights appear, we should remember that they are attained but gradually and step by step, and that those who now stand near the summit once toiled in the mire of the valleys, even as we are doing. Although this Path may at first seem hard and toilsome, yet ever as we rise our footing becomes firmer and our outlook wider, and thus we find ourselves better able to help those who are climbing beside us.

Because it is at first thus hard and toilsome to the lower self, it has sometimes been called by the very misleading title of "the path of woe"; but, as Dr. Besant has beautifully written, "though all such suffering there is a deep and abiding joy, for the suffering is of the lower nature and the joy of the higher. When the last shred of the personality is gone, all that can thus suffer has passed away, and in the perfected Adept there is unruffled peace and everlasting joy. He sees the end toward which all is working, and rejoices in that end, knowing that earth's sorrow is but a passing phase in human evolution.

"That of which little has been said is the profound content which comes from being on the Path, from realizing the goal and the way to it, from knowing that the power to be useful is increasing, and that the lower nature is being gradually extirpated. And little has been said of the rays of joy which fall upon the Path from loftier levels, the dazzling glimpses of the glory to be revealed, the serenity which the storms of earth cannot ruffle. To anyone who has entered on the Path all other ways have lost their charm, and its sorrows have a keener bliss than the best joys of the lower world." (Vâhan, Vol. v, No. 12.)

Let no man therefore despair because he thinks the task too great for him; what man has done man can do, and just in proportion as we extend our aid to those whom we can help, so will those who have already attained be able in their turn to help us. So from the lowest to the highest we who are treading the steps of the Path are bound together by one long chain of mutual service, and none need feel neglected or alone, for though sometimes the lower flights of the great staircase may be wreathed in mist, we know that it leads up to happier regions and purer air, where the light is always shining.
